Fortieth Anniversary Issue
Dear Alumni and Friends,

The first issue of _The Nebraska Transcript_ was published 40 years ago and, as you can see from what you have in your hands, it is still thriving today. The _Transcript_ is a very important publication for the College of Law. It is the best history we have of the College over the past four decades and will certainly be a prime source when the Law College's definitive history is written. (Are there any volunteers for that project?) The _Transcript_ has also been the primary way in which we communicate with our alumni and friends about happenings at the Law College.

Looking through the first volume, it is clear that much has stayed the same. For example:

- Alumni of the College were making a mark on the world. The 1966 _Transcript_ reported that Stan Hathaway, Class of 1950, had just been elected governor of Wyoming; Donald Kelley, Class of 1930, had just been appointed to the Colorado Supreme Court; Lee White, Class of 1950, had been appointed chairman of the Federal Power Commission by President Lyndon Johnson; and Phil Sorensen, Class of 1959, had been a recent Nebraska gubernatorial candidate.

- The Law College was seeking donations. The issue contained a letter from the chair of the Nebraska Law College Fund, Tom Davies, Class of 1937, asking for donations. It also reported that the donations were being put to good use: 30 students were receiving scholarships totaling $4,800, in amounts ranging from $100 to $500. In comparison, this year 148 students are receiving scholarships totaling $1,370,589 in amounts ranging from $2,500 to $21,000. If this seems like a big increase, it is worth remembering that tuition and fees in 1966 were $246 for residents and $600 for non-residents, compared to $9,213 and $21,580 today.

- The Law College was a vibrant academic community. The issue reported that Professor David Dow was completing the second of two books on Nebraska law; that Allen E. Peterson had just been named the editor-in-chief of the _Nebraska Law Review_; that the Honorable Harvey M. Johnsen, Class of 1919, the recently-retired chief judge of the Eighth Circuit Court of Appeals, was to present a lecture; and that professors Richard Broude and Leonard Kaplan had recently joined the faculty.

- Student humor was a work-in-progress. In the first issue, the following “famous last words” were reported: “If I were you McNaughten, I’d plead guilty;” and “Rockaway Beach! Track four, and have a good time Mrs. Palsgraf.” The issue asked, but did not answer, this important question: “Is money received from a pool collected in class payable to the first person called on includable as income under § 74 of the ’54 code?”

- The Dean’s column was masterful. Dean Henry Grether’s column congratulated the students who took the initiative to found the _Transcript_. But I especially liked the title of the column – Caesar Dicit – and think the current editors should consider reviving that custom.

Hearty congratulations and thank you to all who have been a part of this important publication for the past 40 years. This includes especially Professor Dick Harnsberger, who was the faculty advisor for that first issue, and Professor Alan Frank, who has served the publication for the past 33 years, first as faculty advisor and then as editor.

Transcript, ‘Dean Grether’s Child,’ Designed to Keep Alumni Informed

This was Dean [Henry] Grether’s child,” remembered Jim DeMars, ’69, a member of the original staff of THE NEBRASKA TRANSCRIPT. DeMars talked to the TRANSCRIPT in his Lincoln law office as the magazine celebrates its 40th year of publication.

The first edition of the TRANSCRIPT was published in November 1966. DeMars recalled that during first-year orientation in 1966, Grether announced that the College was going to publish a newspaper and that he was looking for students to put it out. Second-year student Robert A. Feder, ’68, had already been selected as the TRANSCRIPT’s first editor, and DeMars, who had worked on the yearbook while an undergrad­uate at the University, was named, along with Bob Weaver, ’69, to be an assistant editor. Feder’s faculty advisor, Richard Harnsberger, ’49, was the publication’s first faculty advisor. DeMars was the TRANSCRIPT’s editor in the publication’s third year, 1968-1969.

DeMars said Grether’s main purpose in starting the TRANSCRIPT was “to improve relations with the alumni. He wanted the alumni to know what the law school was doing.” The name that was selected for the publication – THE NEBRASKA TRANSCRIPT – reflected that purpose. The newspaper was to be a record of events and happenings around the College of Law.

According to DeMars, Grether “was very adamant that the TRANSCRIPT had to be in a newspaper format.” One reason for this was the concern in the student body that this new publication “was going to turn into some sort of law review. But when the first issue came out, everyone realized that we were not going to be doing case notes.”

By the 1969-1970 academic year, the TRANSCRIPT had changed to a magazine format, which, according to the editors, was “more durable and more readable.” Another reason, said Peter Beekman, ’70, the TRANSCRIPT’s editor during the format change, “was pure and simple economics. The price of newsprint was starting to go out of sight and a smaller publication on a different paper stock was cheaper.”

There was no money in the Law College’s budget to pay the staff, so Grether arranged for the staff members to be paid for editing the College of Law’s annual Bulletin, which was intended for the College’s applicants and potential applicants. DeMars was also helped financially by being a Legal Writing instructor under Professor Lawrence Berger.

DeMars recalls that the TRANSCRIPT’s staff did not have to look hard for stories. Students would come up to the staff and tell them, for example, that the moot court team was going to New York, and the staff would tell the students to take notes and see if pictures could be taken. “The most difficult thing I had to do,” he said, “was dealing with the post office on bulk mailing.” While putting out six issues a year involved a lot of work, the staff had fun, too. “The rage in law school at that time,” he remembered, was tropical fish. “We had a couple of small fish tanks in the office, and we were breeding fan-tail guppies.”

After his graduation from the Law College, DeMars served in the military, clerked for the Nebraska Supreme Court and went into private practice specializing in construction litigation and workers’ compensation insurance defense with the firm that is now DeMars, Gordon, Olson & Zalewski. He was happy to think back to his law school years and the opportunity Dean Grether gave him to be on “the absolute ground floor” of the founding of the College’s alumni publication and then “over the years, to watch what it has turned into – a really major project.”
Forty years ago, in November 1966, the first issue of THE NEBRASKA TRANSCRIPT was published. That first TRANSCRIPT was laid out in a newspaper format. In 1969, it switched to a magazine format. Now it is printed on glossy paper and in full color. While the TRANSCRIPT has undergone a number of format changes and utilized a number of logos, then, as now, its purpose was to “bring... to the students and the faculty a common forum.”

The TRANSCRIPT’s first editor, Robert A. Feder, ’68, noted in his editorial in the first issue that the College’s alumni numbered ten times the student body of 250. Today the College has 6,100 living alums and an untold number of friends who receive the printed version of the TRANSCRIPT or access it online. We hope that this quick glance at past issues of the TRANSCRIPT brings forth to all of them fond memories of dedicated editors and important events in the College of Law’s distinguished history:

David Clausing, Class of 2008, Traverses Peaks & Cliffs of Law School’s First Year; It’s Like ‘Juggling Fire’

By W. Jesse Weins
Meet David. David is a single, active, fire-juggling (that’s right) 1L at the College of Law. This young man is embarking on that famous journey, the path that every potential lawyer must climb – the first year of law school. Full of peaks and cliffs, this path is like none ever trod before, even for people comfortable in elite academic environments. To those who have done so, remembering this journey invariably brings to mind an array of intense emotions, each of which David is intermittently experiencing, from jubilation and confidence to discouragement and (dare I say) panic. Together, let us return to this unique time and relive the first year of law school, through the eyes of one David Clausing, class of 2008.

Life Interrupted

Law school was not a lifetime goal or automatic decision, admits David in his mellifluous and candid voice. Standing well over six feet tall, with short, dark hair, usually topped with a worn baseball cap, he talks about his past. For the past three years, he has been employed at the Creighton University Medical Center. At this hospital, he worked as a medical technologist in the flow cytometry laboratory, a clinical lab and part of the general lab that performs any tests a doctor might order on a patient. David’s lab was used to monitor the T-cell counts in HIV patients, to make specific diagnoses of leukemia and lymphomas and to provide prognostic information for breast cancer patients.

However, during this time as a medical technologist, the idea of studying law, especially health law, began to interest David. One of his best friends is a lawyer, and David met a number of people from her firm. Each of these lawyers, he found, was friendly and seemed to be an interesting person with whom to have discussions. Consequently, after talking it over with more friends and family, he decided to pursue a J.D. “Why not,” he thought, since he had considered a graduate degree previously anyway.

In deciding upon a law school, David considered online advice, as well as books about weighing the reputation, price and structure of different law programs. He was accepted to a number of schools, but was drawn back to the College of Law because of the value of its education. “I was able to get a great education in my own state for a good price,” he says. “I was also looking forward to moving back to Lincoln. It’s a community I really enjoy.”

When the time to matriculate approached, David believes it almost a relief, considering how the year had been going until then. Selling his place in Omaha, moving a couple of times and finding a place in Lincoln keeps him from too much anxiety about classes ahead of time. Even so, David knows of the extreme workload approaching, so he continues to talk to friends who had been through it. “I worry less if I actually know what’s in store for me,” he says. Naturally, he is also apprehensive about quitting his job to go back to school, and about the lost security of a pay check.
During orientation, at first David is anxious to get the year started, but as it wears on and he and his new classmates listen to numerous speakers, David begins to appreciate the company he is in. He enjoys the ethics seminar with judges and attorneys from the community the most.

The First Semester – Taking the Bull by the Horns

After a couple of weeks of class, David’s mind set has changed focus. “The time before law school and during orientation was about the big picture – questions like, ‘Why do I want to do it?’ and ‘What does it take to be successful?’ Now, my thoughts are centered around the difference between property lost and property mislaid. Does it matter? Has Prof. Works entered into a contract if he walks from R Street to O Street with a chicken on his head? These are the concerns on my mind these days. It seems as though I am already in the thick of it, but I have a feeling I ain’t seen nothin’ yet.”

Despite these realizations, David still feels prepared, anticipating what lies ahead. He tends to spend about four to five hours after classes studying course material, plus an hour or two between classes reviewing what was covered. He is also taking advantage of advice from professors and Dean Glenda Pierce on preparation for class and exams. At this early point, Contracts is the class that is on David’s mind the most when he’s outside of classes. “Hopefully,” he states, “this compensates for understanding it least while in class.”

Civil Procedure has also been a time consuming class, probably due to the complex interlocking nature of the federal rules.

David has been adapting study habits to fit the law school environment. Undergraduate classes required him to know the information exactly as he had been instructed. For law school, however, his study primarily involves interpreting a jumbled mass of instruction, cases and supplemental material, in an effort to apply legal rules in any given circumstance. In other words, he finds that he is more responsible for teaching himself the concepts than in college.

Moreover, David has noticed how his time for personal hobbies has lessened. This can be difficult, as he likes to stay active by running or biking around town, and he has a tendency to be creative and begin various projects. Oftentimes, this involves starting various construction projects, like repairing bicycles or making a bat-house for his mother. “Right now I have plans for a couple carved out speaker boxes, some coffee table legs and a ½ inch plank of plywood,” he replies. David has even been known to juggle on-fire torches if the occasion should arise, but he is also content to “sit around a coffeehouse with friends.”

One of the first jarring aspects of law school is the Legal Research and Writing course. This begins with a “closed” memo, meaning the applicable precedent is given to the students, and they simply apply it. Next, during the “open” memo, students are still not allowed to use computer-assisted legal research, even simply for printing (hence the pockets full of quarters), but they must seek out relevant cases. David’s memo concerns how to apply the Texas Whistleblower Act. His fictitious client was fired from her job after reporting to the district attorney that her boss had committed forgery. “The main legal issue in question was whether she made her claim in good faith as required by the Texas Whistleblower Act,” David states. Fortunately, once David finds the pertinent statute and a treatise on his subject, most of the cases he wants are referenced there. At this point, he merely pulls the reporters and copies the cases.

As December mid-terms and finals approach, David becomes increasingly concerned with Civil Procedure. This mid-term is 50 per cent of the final grade, and they had already tested the waters with a practice exam. Thus, David is sure that Prof. Lenich will write a long, complex hypo with many and multifarious issues. In this course, there are numerous rules that do not always seem to tie together. Torts, says David, is the class in which he is currently most comfortable.

When asked to describe his “daily groove,” David notes that it tends to vary. “It really depends on how late I go bed the night before, but I often get up in time for an hour of reading before morning class. Between classes, I also read material for the next classes. If it’s a day where class continues until 3 p.m., I rarely go straight to the library afterwards. Instead, I go home for awhile or to the rec center. I usually return to the library around 6 p.m. and work on the research assignment, afterwards getting together with a friend to outline. I stay at the library until 9 or 10 p.m., sometimes later if I feel behind. When I get home, I often read more material that might be covered in class the next day. Lately I’ve been trying to understand a particular Contracts case, so I keep re-reading it just so I have a clue for the next morning. I might get to bed then around midnight. Last night, I did Torts from 10 p.m. until 3 a.m. It just seemed like a good time to work on it.”

Luckily, David is also finding ways to relax through it all. He likes to meet friends at local coffee establishments, such as Mo Java Café & Roasting Co., The Coffee House and Meadowlark Coffee & Espresso.

Give Him a (Christmas) Break

After the close of the first semester, and those very first exams, David travels to Waverly, Iowa, where his entire family congregates to celebrate Christmas at his grandparents’ farm. David grew up in Hastings, but a few years ago, his father, who is a Lutheran pastor, took a position with a church in Arkansas. His mother found a job within the Arkansas prison system as a principal for its GED schooling program. David’s sister, who visited Lincoln during the first semester, also makes the trip from Seattle. She and her husband recently had their first child, David’s nephew Noah. David takes his fill of leisure time in December, but once again returns to prepare and study the week before classes resume.

The Second Semester – A Mental Marathon

By the second semester of one’s first year, that Legal Research and Writing course becomes a nearly obsessive focus. David’s adjunct instructor is local attorney Gary Young, whom David’s believes “undersold” himself in their small group’s initial meetings. While Young contended that the students would not think amibly of him once their writing projects were underway, David has found this to be inaccurate. He is impressed with Young’s understanding of legal writing, especially after working through their differences with the general specifications of the large group instructions.

The two early memos of the first semester give way to a memo that sets up students’ briefs and oral arguments in the spring. The issue of David’s brief is a sticky one, in the grey area of constitutional confinement by public officials. Specifically describing his issue as “whether, under the facts and Supreme Court precedent, a policeman subjected a woman to custodial interrogation while questioning her in a hospital,” David rattles off pertinent facts at a whirlwind pace. A woman had entered herself into a hospital because of a laceration on her leg. An officer approached her and questioned her about a murder that had recently taken place. Eventually, the woman confessed to the murder, and when she confessed, the officer read her the Miranda warnings and put her under arrest.

Even so, David notes that he was initially disappointed and taken aback when he was assigned to represent the police officer for his brief, since David’s memo had leaned toward the conclusion that the officer had, in fact, put the woman through a custodial interrogation. In other words, he is forced to argue the opposite side of what he thought the appropriate outcome should be. In his scramble to present the police officer’s side convincingly, David does additional research and later actually becomes convinced that his earlier conclusion was erroneous.

Now, he maintains and truly believes that the officer did not engage in a wrongful custodial interrogation, primarily because the hospital is unlike a police station and the officer did not place her there.

After turning in his brief, David turns to his oral argument. When the practice session is over, he describes it as “tremendously helpful” because he has never been involved in public speaking before. David had been given a speaking role in civil procedure class with Prof. Lenich, unlike a police station and the officer did not place her there.

After his practice round, however, he comments, “It is nice to know that you’re on the right track.” While he is happy with his argument’s introduction, he wants to study up on a few questions, as well as become more assertive in his speaking style.

Before the oral argument graded presentation, David admits that he feels “a little stressed,” although he laughs and seems to be in good spirits. He also looks the part, standing tall in a white shirt and black suit jacket. As the session ends, David is satisfied with his performance. “The judges said I had answered their questions directly on point, which is good,” he comments, “but one thought I was too reserved in my speaking style.” The judges wasted no time, he says, since early in his introduction one threw a question at him that forced him to the middle of the issues. Perhaps this was because David was the final speaker, as the appellee of the second legal issue. Happily, however, the end of Legal Research and Writing prompts a “good time” with many first years. David and others visit Bodega’s Alley afterwards, before (what luck!) finding an Alpha Xi Delta taco feed that continues until 2 a.m.

Spring finals strike with blazing intensity, as the final few weeks slide by. The stamina needed to battle through on all five exams takes a mental and physical toll. Because they encompass a two-week period, the exams’ continual strain just doesn’t seem to let up. David deftly fights his way through, however, reaching for the light at the end of the tunnel. And then... (giant sigh) it’s over. He thinks that there is a tendency to be overconfident with one’s answers, since with essays, what one writes is what one believes to be correct. As his grades are displayed, David notes that he did better on Torts that he imagined, with his lowest mark being in Contracts. He finds it interesting how different the exams were, depending on the professor who taught the course.

Looking back, David notes that each important event through the year seems like ages ago, such as looking at the first semester while in the second semester or looking at the second semester just three weeks after finals. The time flies by; in fact, other stories must wait for another day.

Ask him about his bicycle ride down Walton Trail and picnic with Prof. Lawson after having won the prize at the Women’s Law Caucus auction, or about his shadowing experience with an attorney at a Methodist Hospital in Omaha during spring break.

The Next Step

David never had a set plan concerning law school. He thought he would get out of “the lab” for awhile and become versed in the issues he cares about most deeply. “Law school sounded like the most interesting thing to do,” David admits simply. He is not worried about getting any specific type of job. He does not even necessarily want to be a lawyer; he just wants to learn law. Besides, he could always return to the lab if he needed an income. “I am enjoying school more and more,” he states, “maybe even to the point of practicing.”

In that regard he is off to a great start. Having taken advantage of the Nebraska Fund for Clerkships in the Public Interest, David is working over the summer for Nebraska Appleseed, a non-profit organization that serves low-income families, immigrants and children in Nebraska. Half of his time is paid through the grant, and the other half is for law school credit as an externship and research in selected field course with Prof. Lawson. David is researching Nebraska’s health care issues, such as viewing other states’ statutes that include incentive programs for providing health care to employees. He hopes to encourage such health care and insurance options for employees here in Nebraska.

Yes, in the end, David conquered Goliath, that daunting first year of law school that threatens to crush all challengers. In fact, he looks forward to the challenges of the next two years. If David could give some advice to next year’s 1Ls, he’d tell them to take advantage of upper-class students’ knowledge, especially on helpful study aids and on the ways to study for individual professors. Sounds like juggling fire, doesn’t it? But, then again, that’s what being a 1L is all about.
Justice Ginsburg: ‘Independent Judiciary Essential to Rule of Law’

Essential to the rule of law in any land is an independent judiciary - judges not under the thumb of other branches of the government, and therefore equipped to administer the law impartially.” With these words, Ruth Bader Ginsburg, associate justice of the United States Supreme Court, began her April 7, 2006, lecture, “Maintaining the Independence of the U.S. Judiciary,” to more than 500 students, lawyers, judges and administrators at the College of Law as part of the Roman L. Hruska Institute for the Administration of Justice.

She went on to warn that “judicial independence is vulnerable to assault; it can be shattered if the society law exists to protect does not take care to assure its preservation.” Ginsburg cited examples from Uganda, Russia and Ecuador of how “the best efforts of judges to adjudicate cases fairly can be thwarted.”

The U.S. Supreme Court has fared far better, she reminded her audience. The constitutional guarantees of lifetime tenure and salaries that cannot be diminished by the legislature have helped secure the judiciary’s independence from the political branches of government, but Ginsburg said, far more important is “a culture that frowns on attempts to make the courts over to fit the president’s or Congress’ image.”

Ginsburg described three instances in which the Court confronted unconstitutional assertions of power by the executive branch. One was when the Nixon administration refused to hand over the recordings and documents concerning the Watergate investigation. A second was when President Truman was ordered by the Court to rescind his executive order seizing 85 steel companies on the eve of a strike by steelworkers.

Her third example involved the treatment of prisoners captured after the September 11, 2001, terrorist attacks. In Hamdi v. Rumsfeld, the Court held that a U.S. citizen, who had been captured in Afghanistan as an “enemy combatant” and who was being held on a Navy brig, must be allowed to challenge the factual basis of his detention before a tribunal meeting the demands of due process. Justice O’Connor, writing for a four-judge plurality, wrote that even in “our most challenging and uncertain moments” when “our Nation’s commitment to due process is most severely tested, we must preserve our commitment at home to the principles for which we fight abroad.” And in Rasul v. Bush, the court, in a 6-to-3 decision, ruled that Guantánamo detainees may petition for a federal court review of their situations.

This distinguished record did not prevent Ginsburg from raising current concerns about the independence of the judiciary in this country. Too many, Ginsburg lamented, fail to “entirely understand what history, in large part, bears out: Federal judges ... generally endeavor to administer justice impartially and to interpret laws reasonably and sensibly, with due restraint and fidelity to precedent.”

One “headline producing illustration” of her point was the reaction of then-House Majority Leader Tom DeLay when federal courts refused to order the feeding tube restored to Terri Schiavo, a brain-damaged Florida woman. The courts, she said, had read the federal statute “as it was written, not as a goodly number of the members of Congress wished it had been written.” DeLay had angrily warned that “the time will come for the men responsible for this to answer for their behavior.”

Another concern was the proposal by the House Judiciary Committee to create an “office of inspector general for the federal judiciary.” When the committee’s chairman wrote a letter to the chief judge of a judicial circuit complaining that the court had ordered an unlawfully low sentence for a narcotics case and called for a “prompt response . . . to rectify” the decision, it gave judges... a “good cause for concern” as to what the role envisioned for the inspector general’s office might be.

Ginsburg also decried congressional initiatives to restrict the federal court’s references to foreign law. Foreign law certainly is not binding precedent, she said, but is worthy of consideration, just as treatises and law professors’ articles are.

Another threat to federal judicial independence is a confirmation process that has “often strayed from examining the qualifications of each nominee into an endeavor to uncover some hidden . . . agenda the nominee supposedly harbored.”

Ginsburg also criticized recent congressional efforts to curtail judges’ attendance at out-of-town educational events. Current ethical rules, said Ginsburg, are sufficient to protect against the risk of judges being influenced by private interests that might underwrite legal education seminars. But impeding judges’ ability to attend and participate in such events, in the words of former Chief Justice William Rehnquist, runs “contrary to the public interest in encouraging an informed educated judiciary, and contrary to the American belief in unfettered access to ideas.”

Ginsburg also cautioned against a number of proposals to limit the jurisdiction of the federal courts. Subjects that have recently been proposed for jurisdictional limitation include federal habeas corpus; actions seeking relief against government’s unconstitutional to be overturned by a two-thirds vote of the House and Senate. Said Ginsburg, “The founders of the United States did not envision a rule of law based on pure majoritarianism, and I see no cause to embark on such an experiment now.”

The election of judges in at least 38 states was another subject that Ginsburg raised. Life tenure, she pointed out, is not the only way in which judicial independence can be secured; fixed nonrenewable terms could also be employed. She pointed out that in Nebraska, once appointed, a judge seeking retention must stand for an up or down vote periodically. “How can an elected judge resist doing ‘what the home crowd wants,’” she asked. “I invite this audience’s suggestions for satisfactory answers” to this question.

The Hruska Lectureship is jointly sponsored by the Nebraska State Bar Foundation, the Law College and the federal courts. Prior Hruska lectures have included Supreme Court justices Anthony M. Kennedy and Stephen G. Breyer.

Ruth Bader Ginsburg was nominated for the Supreme Court by President Clinton. She is the second woman to be named to the court. Prior to her appointment, she served as a judge on the United States Court of Appeals for the D.C. Circuit, as a law professor at Rutgers and Columbia and as general counsel for the American Civil Liberties Union. —
Judge Tacha Reflects on Changes, Challenges Impacting Federal Courts

By W. Jesse Weins

On February 8, 2006, Deanell Reece Tacha spoke at the College of Law on "Change and Challenge for the Federal Courts." Tacha, the chief judge of the Court of Appeals for the Tenth Circuit, appeared as the Cline Williams jurist-in-residence. She was introduced by Professor Colleen Medill who clerked for Tacha in 1989-1990.

Tacha discussed the myriad changes facing the federal judiciary in the 21st Century. She addressed the impact of technology in the modern courtroom, issues regarding diversity of the populace and of the bar, the notion of the vanishing trial and recent trends reflected in the federal docket as part of a discussion about the ever-evolving nature of the third branch of government.

She has been on the federal bench for over 20 years, the last five as the chief judge on the Tenth Circuit. This has given her a good foundation for understanding the legal landscape during this period, as well as insight into the future of the country's judiciary. She spoke concerning this landscape and what it portends.

First, Tacha described "The Whats" of the past 20 years, i.e., the legal issues the federal courts have dealt with. In this time, there have been many major changes. The Federal Sentencing Guidelines, which were far more stringent than state guidelines, had been enacted by Congress. As a result, more prosecutions were being brought in federal courts.

In 1985, there were only a handful of federal crimes, as criminal law was primarily state law. Today, however, there are over 500 federal crimes.

Federal discrimination law is much broader and more mature than it used to be. Likewise, environmental law was in its youth 20 years ago. The Supreme Court has recently granted certiorari in a larger percentage of business cases, and the ramifications will resound in both the profit and nonprofit sectors. Focus on white collar crime has also expanded, especially in the severity of sentences and penalties. In addition, there is a new set of bankruptcy amendments, and these amendments have an impact on judicial caseloads. Perhaps the biggest "neon light" for federal courts concerns immigration law. All courts are being impacted, but the caseloads of border states have increased exponentially.

Other changes will continue to impact our system for decades, if not longer. Technology aids our understanding of many issues, such as water law and intellectual property. Expert testimony is much more efficient because of technology, and information is more available and more sophisticated. Tacha presided over the Oklahoma City bombing cases in the Tenth Circuit and believes that legal issues concerning terrorism will continue to occupy the courts. Examples include the legal ramifications of the Patriot Act, including surveillance and the treatment of enemy combatants.

Next, Tacha discussed "The Whys" of the past 20 years, i.e., the influences on the law. Scholars will remember this period as a remarkable one in which the court adapted old principles to novel situations. In this age, constitutional provisions have begun to collide. The developments since the Constitution's drafting have resulted in legal issues impacting many areas of the law that the founders could not have imagined. Moreover, respect for state law and state constitutions has increased during this period.

Tacha continued by considering "The Who," i.e., the faces behind the law during the past 20 years. She stated that the bench has changed in character, that there are happily more women and more people of color in the judiciary. This helps to reflect the diversity of the American public. On a less positive note, there has been a dramatic drop in the number of judges coming from private practice. The Eisenhower administration, for example, appointed 65 percent of its judges from private practice, while the Bush administration has only chosen 38 percent from private practice. This is problematic because judges with practice experience are helpful to the system. Unfortunately, this may be due to the lower pay, since “even the academics are making more than the judges!”

“The How” of the administration of justice has also changed, according to Tacha. She is concerned that our nation may be relying too much on alternative dispute resolution. ADR is a necessary feature, but right now 98 percent of civil trials are not in the regular courts. This rate is worrisome because such procedures are not transparent. This makes the administration of justice seem hidden. In contrast, traditional courts are transparent, inviting public observance and concern.

In addition, “The How” of what judges do is impacted by the jump in caseloads. In 1985, all the circuits together had a caseload of over 33,000. In 2005, it was over 68,000. Despite this increase, except for a few exceptions on the borders, there are no new Article III judges.

Finally, Tacha finds that the public itself has changed. In the early 1980s, CNN and USA Today began to make people aware of the “hot button” legal topics, as well as high profile trials and events. Even so, the public is ill-educated regarding how the law actually works or even what general legal concepts, like the independent judiciary, mean. Tacha concluded that lawyers and judges must help the public in its ability to understand legal history and formulate intelligent legal opinions. Because we have been granted a legal education, we have a civil duty to aid the rest of the country. She calls for us all to “be more than advocates; be patriots!”

Pound Lecturer, Waldron, Addresses Trade-Offs Between Liberty, Security

By W. Jesse Weins

Beginning with the truism that “nobody wants to be blown up,” Waldron focused his speech on the trade-offs between civil liberties and national security in the post 9/11 United States. Are less civil liberties and more government surveillance a necessary condition of heightened security? It is impossible to know, he stated, since we have not been victims of another successful attack. Yet, it is possible to gain perspective over the civil liberties/national security balance by deconstructing the meaning of security and how it may be found in society.

Waldron considered the relationship between “security” and “individual safety.” Concerns about individual safety do not explain what Waldron calls the “depth” of the issue — the fear of violent death, living with fear, the loss of assurance, the loss of routines.

Nor do they explain the “breadth” of the issue. Individuals may be differently situated with regard to threats to their safety. Thus, a higher degree of national security as a whole does not necessarily make certain individuals (such as the poor), or certain areas (such as those in public buses) any more secure. Some individuals will no doubt be additionally compromised by the increased government surveillance, such as those who “look” like terrorists. Thus security is not a pure public good, one that can be equally distributed. Some methods of raising security may actually hurt security for some sections of society, in effect trading the liberty of a few for enhanced security of others.

According to Waldron, an aggregate view of security is not the best way to conceptualize the civil liberty/national security debate. Instead, we must see the needs of individuals who could be marginalized and the needs of a potentially-injured minority. Our nation’s people do not want to be safe from danger by being locked in a sealed room. We want mutual security for all individuals, along with decreased fear. The trade-offs expose this debate’s complicated relationship, but we must see the individual, as well as the whole. Moreover, we must see security as more than just individual safety, but also factor in the harm fear itself can engender.

Symposium Contemplates Controversial Modern Legacy of Nebraska Lawyer William Jennings Bryan

By JASON A. CANTONE

When people think of the most famous lawyer to hail from Nebraska, William Jennings Bryan is usually the first to come to mind. Whether known for his part in the Scopes Monkey Trial (seeking to prevent children from learning about evolution) or his role in politics (highlighted by unsuccessful presidential runs), Bryan is one of the most well known lawyers in American history.

Michael Kazin, professor of history at Georgetown University authored A Godly Hero: The Life of William Jennings Bryan, which evaluates Bryan's legacy and the profound impact Bryan made on the political, economic and legal foundations of our society. Just as Bryan has been called “one of the most controversial lawyers,” Kazin’s novel has also been described as controversial.

“I heard the book is controversial, and if there’s a place to showcase this controversy and talk about it, it should be here at the College of Law,” said Assistant Professor Susan Franck, the program’s organizer and moderator, before the symposium featuring three prominent lecturers began.

Kazin said society’s interest in populism spawned his interest in Bryan. “I like writing about people who have been dissed … and few have been condescended to as much as Bryan,” Kazin said.

Kazin believes the portrait of Bryan made famous in films and plays such as Inherit the Wind misrepresents Bryan’s important status in American cultural and legal history by presenting him as one with a pathological hatred of knowledge.

Bryan, known as “The Great Commoner” and the most popular orator of his era, received support from the American Federation of Labor, fostering a connection to the Democratic Party that has lasted a hundred years. Kazin said that Bryan was an integral figure in turning Democrats into what we now view as the more liberal of the major political parties. Bryan also cared about civil rights and women’s suffrage. However, he spurned W.E.B. DuBois when DuBois offered to support him, and Bryan refused to remove the KKK from the Democratic Party. Kazin presented this as a political move to garner needed political support, whereas other historians contend that this shows Bryan’s refusal to stand up for minorities.
Professor William Thomas, the John and Catherine Angle professor in the humanities at UNL, focused on how Bryan influenced the development of American railroads and on his modern political legacy. Thomas discussed the 1894 election when Bryan ran for Nebraska’s U.S. Senate seat against a railroad attorney.

“If this was ever good versus evil, this was going to be great,” Thomas said, before reminding those in attendance of Bryan’s election loss.

Thomas mentioned that corporate interest might have bought the legislature, and that this, coupled with Bryan running out of campaign money, brought about his defeat. The railroad industry was described as a force to which “everyone else was subservient — and pulled everyone else into its orbit.” Whole regional economies collapsed and others formed in the wake of railroad expansion, Thomas said. Thomas believes that Bryan’s situation is symbolic of a modern problem where people vote their fears and their wallets.

Jim Chen, associate dean and James L. Krusemark professor of law at the University of Minnesota Law School (and recently appointed dean of the University of Louisville Louis D. Brandeis School of Law), said Bryan is like “a prophet, a stranger to his own country.”

“He was a complete loser in science,” Chen said. “He failed miserably at the one federal job he held” and Chen concluded that it was a good thing that he lost the presidency.

Bryan’s policy of free silver was a crude and obsolete tax policy that had underlying wise ideas. Chen said that free money is great for a growth environment, but people with a fixed stream of income want tight money.

“Ultimately, the Constitution is a financial document,” Chen said, as he focused upon the 1896 financial debates regarding tariffs and government revenue. Traditional politics made it difficult to turn populist fury into legal and electoral reform.

Chen stated that Bryan’s actions, however, helped bring about such reforms as the direct election of senators and replacing a tariff-based economy with a tax-based one. In conclusion, Chen compared Bryan to Moses and other religious figures in his analogies about taking America to “the promised land.”
Congratulations,
Class of 2006!

Members of the College of Law's Class of 2006 received their J.D. degrees on May 6, 2006, at a ceremony held at the Lied Center for the Performing Arts.

The commencement address was delivered by J. Robert (Bob) Kerrey, who served three years in the United States Navy including service in Vietnam and received a pharmacy degree from the University. After a successful business career, he served as Nebraska’s governor for four years and served as a United States senator for 12 years. He is presently the president of The New School, a legendary progressive university located in New York City.

Kerrey told the graduates, “We may not understand your Latin phrases, but we must not abandon our belief in how much the law gives us. You must remind us.”

Christopher J. Riffle, president of the Class of 2006, delivered remarks on behalf of the class. William G. Dittrick, '74, president of the Nebraska State Bar Association, and John V. Hendry, '74, chief justice of the Nebraska Supreme Court, welcomed the new graduates to the legal profession.

Processional and recessional music was provided by the Plymouth Brass.

Law Student Mabrey Works in India To Shut Down Sex Trafficking

BY JASON A. CANTONE

Walking down the streets in India last summer, nothing could prepare Sara Mabrey, '07, for Calcutta's Red Light District.

"The brothels were so dirty, and the men were dirty and everything about it was so disgusting," Mabrey said.

Walking down the street, you would see girls no older than 12 years old lined-up for blocks and blocks. Each girl would do her best to entice men into following her into the brothel and paying for her services.

"It was shocking just how normal all the girls looked," Mabrey said. "They looked like little girls who should be on the playground and not standing in line in front of brothels seeking customers."

Mabrey spent time last summer working with attorneys and social workers at Freedom Firm where she worked with College of Law alum, Glen Parks, '01. Consisting of attorneys and social workers, Freedom Firm seeks to rescue children forced into prostitution and find justice by identifying victims and perpetrators of forced prostitution, mobilizing police to rescue victims and arrest perpetrators and by assisting the legal system in prosecuting perpetrators. Freedom Firm also encourages rescued girls to seek justice and begin rehabilitation. However, these noble tasks are often quite difficult.

The police are occasionally corrupt and tip-off brothels before busts, Mabrey said. In addition, rescued children might not be out of danger.

"In one home for rescued girls in Calcutta, the girls' organs were being sold to provide money to the home," Mabrey said. "In another home, the rescued girls were required to be part of a whole new sex ring when they were at their most vulnerable."

While taking undergraduate psychology courses at Asbury College, in Wilmore, Ky., Mabrey knew she wanted to help end this seemingly never-ending circle of abuse.

"I learned about sex trafficking while at a conference in Washington, D.C., and I was enthralled with the possibility of being able to do something to help," Mabrey said. She said that she was studying child sexual abuse in psychology courses at the time and it intrigued her why people would take part in such a business. Her interest in rescuing the victims of sex trafficking brought her to the College of Law, where she learned how the law could be an effective tool to combat sex trafficking.

Sara Mabrey wears a sari, the traditional garment worn by many women on the Indian subcontinent.
In some situations, parents or family members sell children into the system, while other children are kidnapped and forced to become sex slaves.

"Either way, they're often put into a situation where they can't afford to get out," Mabrey said.

She said that the children often live in boarding houses with a rent inflated to the point where a girl needs to have sex with 10 men a day to pay the bills.

Even with her impressive knowledge and passion to learn about and bring an end to child sex trafficking, Mabrey began the journey with a few worries.

"My biggest fear was that I’d be lonely all summer," Mabrey said. She was worried that she might not hit it off with the social worker she intended to live with for five weeks. Also, she wondered what it would be like to live in a brand new culture where there might not be people with whom to talk and socialize. However, Mabrey said the worst part of her preparation was the immunizations.

"I hate needles and you have to get so many shots to go over and live in India for a summer," she said. "That definitely made me nauseous."

Despite her worries, "everything turned out to be incredible," Mabrey said.

She even started meeting new people on the plane to India.

"I met a couple on the plane, met people on the streets, had meals in people's homes," she said. "Indians were extremely warm and friendly people and easy to get to know."

In addition, Rohi, the social worker she lived with "was amazing," she said.

Mabrey said living in India really opened her eyes to how a different culture views something as looked down upon as child prostitution.

"I began to see society through someone else's eyes," she said. "I could see how women are treated by society and what views everyone has."

Mabrey discovered that it is important to talk about others' cultures to better understand your own and that her experiences made her better equipped for any job.

"Seeing all aspects of the child sex trade made me have compassion for all of the individuals," she said. "You see a terrible poverty and desperation, where children live on the streets with lice crawling all over their bodies."

Mabrey vividly remembered visiting a home for children dying of AIDS. The house was small, with maybe 25 children and house mom and dad who had lived there for 15 years. During the day, the children would attend school and then eat their meals and play at the home. They resided outside of the town, which allowed a quieter atmosphere where the children could play without neighbors watching them like social misfits.

"To know they would all die early made it difficult, but their spirit showed me how blessed I am and how you need to make the most of each and every day," Mabrey said. "You need to live and experience each day."

Law Students Spend Spring Break Providing Legal Help to New Orleans

By Ryan Lindberg

Five College of Law students spent their 2006 spring break volunteering for the New Orleans City Attorney’s Office. Paul Brunner, ‘07, Joneice Burnett, ‘07, Rebekah Caruthers, ‘07, Ryan Lindberg, ’07, and Rebecca Pugh, ’08, spent the months before their trip fundraising to cover the costs associated with flying to and staying in New Orleans. The trip was sponsored by private donations from business as well as the Black Law Students Association. The Nebraska law students were part of a much larger group of law students traveling from law schools across the county to provide legal relief to the people of New Orleans. The Student Hurricane Network, developed by law students to help solve the legal problems created by Hurricane Katrina, organized the relief effort.

While in New Orleans the students spent most of their time working on legal research and writing projects for the City Attorney’s office. The students had the opportunity to meet Mayor Ray Nagin, attend a City Council meeting and tour the Lower Ninth Ward. When not at work the students spent time becoming familiar with New Orleans and had the opportunity to patronize many local establishments, a surprising number of which had already reopened despite the devastation of Hurricane Katrina.

The students were shocked upon seeing the Lower Ninth Ward and the level of destruction that was not apparent in the French Quarter and Business District where the students spent most of their time. All of the students agreed that the trip was a unique experience and were thankful to be able to volunteer some of their newly acquired legal knowledge. The comments of Rebecca Pugh, who is a former resident of New Orleans provide insight into the state of New Orleans, at the time of the students’ visit.

“Having previously lived in and frequently visited pre-Katrina New Orleans, I couldn’t help but notice the changes. At first glance, much of the city appears to be worn but otherwise unaffected. On our first day, I roamed some of the more familiar areas – the French Quarter, the Central Business District [downtown] and Uptown. A few blown out or boarded up windows, closed businesses, fallen posts, and blinking stop lights, were the only obvious reminders of the previous destruction.

“I waded through the cabbage, beads and plastic cups leftover from the Mardi Gras and St. Patrick’s Day celebrations; I sipped coffee alongside the hipster/student crowd on Magazine Street; dodged young people yelping for beads in the French Quarter. So after the first day, I prematurely concluded that New Orleans had either rebounded or remained relatively unscathed.

“The tour of the Lower Ninth Ward was sobering – the devastation was simply unimaginable and undeniable. We saw high water marks, rescuers’ graffiti, houses pushed off their foundations crushed against neighboring houses, overturned cars, toys buried in mud, all signs of life reduced to rubble. I knew the destruction continued past what we saw – through the Ninth Ward, New Orleans East, St. Bernard Parish, and all along the Gulf Coast. Pictures cannot convey the scope of the devastation nor the emotional repercussions. The emotional damage left in Katrina’s wake struck me more than vast piles of rubble.
Hurricane Crisis Spurs Zehtab To Chair Disaster Preparedness Project

“Hurricane Katrina made me angry,” explained Sean Zehtab, ’08. “Everything that could go wrong did go wrong down there in terms of the government response, but I had to ask, ‘What have I done? I’m just as responsible. I’m a law student and I’m going to be part of the legal profession.”

Zehtab’s visits to New Orleans and the Gulf Coast let him see first hand the need to deliver legal services to those who were hardest hit in the aftermath of a disaster – people, especially immigrants and the indigent, who lack legal representation. Some languished in jail, charged with crimes that were allegedly committed before the hurricane, but whose cases remain in limbo; many had already served their maximum possible sentence. Others faced eviction from landlords, but did not have the legal representation needed to present their side.

As a result, he became involved with the Student Hurricane Network and its Disaster Preparedness Committee, which he co-chairs. Working with a law student from Chapman University, who is also getting his Ph.D. in disaster preparedness, and an attorney from the Mississippi Center for Justice, Zehtab’s committee is partnering with ABA’s Pro Bono staff to prepare a model disaster training manual that can be adopted by any state. Upon completion of the template, ever could. The entire city seemed shellshocked. The sense of loss, uncertainty, and desperate hope was palpable in every conversation.

“I learned of the damage from the insistent spirituality of the cabbie who endured worsening conditions in his home for seven days after the storm, from the reticence of the cop who stayed on the job despite losing her house, from the family grateful to be serving falafel to tourists again, from the many people who returned to their jobs without their families because of scarce housing and schools, from the drunken attorney who confided that his newfound love of celebration sprang from his desperate wish to return the city to “normal,” and from the tarot card reader moonlighting as a doorman until the tourists return to ask about their future.

“After a week, I understood that ‘rebuilding’ will require much more than fixing windows and streetlights. Hurricane Katrina left an indelible mark on New Orleanians. But despite the trauma and its wicked reputation, New Orleans has always had a strong and unique community. I have no doubt it will endure.”

In December 2006, during the break between semesters, seven College of Law students participated in the Student Hurricane Network’s Project Gideon. They were Joneice Burnett, ’07, Rebekah Caruthers, ’07, Ramon Griffin, ’09, T.J. Johnson, ’09, Toni Leijá Wilson, ’08, Liam Gallagher, ’09, and Todd Molvar, ’09. More than 150 law students from 12 law schools assisted about 30 New Orleans public defenders with a caseload big enough for at least 72 full-time attorneys. The students went to jails and interviewed criminal defendants who had been waiting to see lawyers for months. ■ students and other organizations in a state will be called upon to research the laws of the state that are relevant to delivering legal assistance to the poor and indigent in the aftermath of a disaster.

The committee plans to promote the project and to train public interest leaders in the manual's use. “We feel it is important to do tabletop simulations and face-to-face training,” Zehtab said. “We have a target list of states that are in high threat areas, ones that have declared emergencies over the past 15 to 20 years and we’re going to work with those first.” He has already attended the ABA’s Criminal Justice Section’s Conference on Disaster Preparedness in the Criminal Justice System in New Orleans and the Equal Justice Works Conference in Washington, D.C., to recruit people to help on the project.

His response to Hurricane Katrina was far from the first time that events have propelled Sean Zehtab to take action in the public interest. He was an undergraduate at the University, majoring in developmental biology, when the attacks of 9/11 occurred. “It was clear that people were going to be fighting on my behalf,” he said, “and I didn’t have anything to stop me from being part of that.”

Along with his older brother, he enlisted in the Army and served in Iraq for 14 months. “I was a tanker, but in Iraq we also did patrols in Humvees and the sort of nation building you see on TV – building schools, going to community meetings and patrolling the neighborhoods,” he explained. Near the end of his deployment, an uprising in several cities led to his involvement in major combat in Sadr City and Najaf.

It was Zehtab’s experiences in Iraq that led him to law school. “I was interested in the law in Iraq because it seemed like such a lawless place. Soldiers were enforcing the law and making up the law as they went along. Within the broad confines of the Geneva Convention and our orders, we were out there on the street acting as judge, jury and executioner all in one,” he recalled. “That really got me interested in the law and why people have laws and obey them.” After he graduates, returning to the Army as a JAG officer is an option he’s considering.

Zehtab’s Iraqi experience led him to another endeavor – politics. The society he had left to enter the military was not the same when he returned. The country seemed more militarized and more desensitized. While the threat of terrorism is very real, Zehtab believes some elements in society were taking advantage of the fear it engendered. At the same time, “the destruction of the middle class is going on unabated. Here in the heartland, people are hurting. Health care costs are exploding; illegal immigration and globalization are problems. Cheaper goods at a store are of no benefit to those who can’t buy those goods because they don’t have a job.”

He ran for the Nebraska legislature in the 26th district. He campaigned on improving education in the state by rethinking how the state delivers education in rural areas and on stopping the Nebraska practice of “roller-coaster budgets.” He emphasized making investments in drawing business to the state and in technology in order to make the state less dependent on agriculture. “The great thing about the information economy is you can do things anywhere in the world. You can do it in Massachusetts, you can do it in California, Oregon and Texas, and you can do it in Nebraska, too,” he said. “We need to address problems before they happen, he added, like preparing for the time when much of the manual labor will be done by robots.

Even though he finished a distant third among the three candidates in the race, Zehtab said he gained from the experience. “I enjoyed meeting and talking to people and the challenge of figuring out where I stood on the issues,” he recalled. “I went into it with the idea that I’m probably not going to win, but I’m going to talk about the issues that I care about and represent myself well, and I’m going to listen to people.” He also found it amusing that many people came to him with concerns that had nothing to do with state government. “It’s like running for dog catcher, but you’re not running for dog catcher.”

It was difficult to run for the legislature while a law student. But even though he is no longer involved in a political campaign, Zehtab finds time to pursue his passion for the public interest while continuing his legal studies. His involvement in the Student Hurricane Network is just one such endeavor. Another is his conviction that ordinary people need to know more about the law. He enjoyed teaching in the Law College’s Community Legal Education Project last year, and this year he is working with the national Street Law program to teach a course in practical law in area high schools and community centers. A pilot program in one school begins this spring. To him, this is just a beginning. “I definitely believe that in this law school there is a great opportunity to create tremendous public interest lawyers due to the quality of our education and the relatively low tuition costs that reduce our student loan debt.” Zehtab certainly is doing all he can to bring this about.
Former Loyola-New Orleans Student Finds Respite from Hurricane Trauma

By W. Jesse Weins and Ellie Tytke

Ellie Tytke transferred to the College of Law after Hurricane Katrina induced a temporary hiatus at the Loyola University-New Orleans School of Law in Louisiana. The hurricane left her apartment flooded, her car totaled and her life in disarray. Although Loyola is once again holding classes, Ellie is happy with her decision to move to Nebraska and attend the Law College.

The daughter of a newspaper reporter, Tytke was used to moving around the country. She had lived in Florida, Alabama and California before studying at Florida State University and graduating from Emory University in 2002. After two years in the workforce, she decided to go to law school. Location was central to her decision in choosing a law school. New Orleans appealed to her because she is an avid live music fan and the city had a thriving local music scene. She also looked at the employment rate for recent graduates and the cost of living, which was lower in New Orleans than in many large cities.

Tytke was initially impressed with the friendliness of the students and administration at Loyola, where she made many friends. The hurricane hit late in the summer after her first year at Loyola. She was with friends traveling to see their favorite band. She was aware that a hurricane was scheduled to hit Florida, and perhaps New Orleans, but the constant hurricane warnings and two previous evacuations that year, had desensitized her and others to the danger.

Having lost her cell phone, Tytke was not aware of the growing strength of the hurricane or that it had turned toward Louisiana until she saw what was happening while watching the Weather Channel in a gas station in Indianapolis. Even after she replaced her lost cell phone, she wasn’t able to get through to New Orleans. By the time she returned to her mother’s home in Tallahassee, she had learned through emails that her friends were safe, so her primary concern was for her cat Uma. She knew that the friends who were looking after Uma were unable to reach her and that she had been stranded in her apartment on the first floor of an apartment complex.

The first day that Louisiana officials allowed reentry into the state, Tytke and her mother headed for New Orleans. The drive was creepy, to say the least. As they moved through Gulf Port, Miss., Katrina’s wrath was evident. Power lines were leveled; trees had snapped like twigs; road signs were broken in half. Abandoned cars littered the sides of the road and debris was everywhere. Approaching the New Orleans area, there was a distinct and putrid smell. It is hard to describe – something like mold and garbage.

The drive took eleven hours; they arrived in the middle of the night.

The city was eerily quiet and dark. Occasionally, a police vehicle or military vehicle would drive past, and there were spotlights run by generators at a few intersections. It was hard to see with no power, but the devastation was apparent. Buildings were toppled; trash was strewn everywhere; trees had fallen. Driving into her neighborhood in the Metairie neighborhood, all was still. Each block was different, however. Some neighborhoods seemed to have suffered little damage; others were devastated.

She entered her apartment with a police officer. They found Uma in the bathtub, shaking but unharmed. A quick scan of the apartment revealed that her cat was smart to hide in the bathtub. The carpet was soaking wet and the bathroom had an inch or so of standing water. Everything was covered in mold. Nothing seemed to be missing, but the cupboards were all opened. Only later would they discover that looters had kicked in the door, looking for food and water, and that neighbors who lived above Tytke had supplied the cat with food and water.

In Florida, Tytke attempted to make a decision about law school. It was two weeks into the semester. Some of her friends were attending various schools from across the country, but when Loyola announced that it was opening a satellite branch at the University of Houston primarily for first-year students, she decided to go there. The University of Houston was very accommodating, but the long commute, parking difficulties and taking classes at odd hours were hard to deal with. Moreover, while in school, Tytke was in constant battle with FEMA. Trying to get help was like a full-time job.

By the spring semester, Loyola was up and running again. But Tytke had few reasons to stay. By then, looters had taken everything from her apartment, and life in New Orleans was chaotic. She decided to transfer to the College of Law. She was familiar with Lincoln, having visited the city to see a band at the Rococo Theater. Then, as now, she found Lincoln to be exceptionally agreeable. The people are friendly, the downtown quaint and the climate much cooler than the south. Her contacts with the school were positive. The admissions office was a delight to deal with. Helpful, accommodating and empathetic are the three best words she can think of to describe office personnel Beki Colberg and Vicki Lill. Having been through so much, Tytke found it a relief to have such caring people on staff.

She is glad she chose to transfer. The students have been very friendly, and she likes her classes and professors. The classes are a bit smaller, which is also a plus. The quality of the instruction is superior and the workload comparable to what she experienced at Loyola. She loves living on a lake, being able to cross town in fifteen minutes and the change of seasons. It is a different life here, which moves at a more comfortable pace.

Tytke hopes that this disaster will foster greater recognition of the unfortunate situation in New Orleans. Outsiders travel to the city for Mardi Gras and Jazzfest, but they do not see the impoverished children and dilapidated homes that sit just a mile or two from the French Quarter. Furthermore, the poverty line in this area is closely associated with race, as the majority of the city's poor are black. Some have faulted those families for not being able or willing to evacuate, but it is not mentioned that over 20 per cent of New Orleans households lacked access to a car. She asks, "If one's family has no transportation, and one's entire life has always been in New Orleans, how and where would a person go anyway?"
Thomas O. Barnett: Working for Justice

A lot has happened to Thomas O. Barnett between leaving his childhood home in Norfolk and speaking at the Law College in September 2006. Barnett gained international exposure as a Fulbright Scholar in the United Kingdom, where he first met Dean Steve Willborn. But Barnett’s success is even more profound in America.

The Senate confirmed Barnett as assistant attorney general of the Antitrust Division, United States Department of Justice, on February 10, 2006, after an extensive legal career that included a clerkship in the U.S. Court of Appeals for the Fourth Circuit. Barnett drew from these experiences when presenting his lecture on anti-trust law.

Barnett provided an overview of the history of antitrust laws in America and explained in simple terms how supply and demand can be negatively affected by price-fixing schemes.

Competition is a fundamental guiding principle for our nation’s economic policy, spurring innovation and maintaining effective pricing, he said. Barnett explained that cartel enforcement is the Antitrust Division’s top enforcement priority. The division is also trying to convince other countries to impose penalties to prevent cartels.

Barnett related antitrust procedures to known psychological forces such as the Prisoner’s Dilemma, where you are better off being the first to confess and gain amnesty from further criminal liability.

Luke Alexander, ’07, said the lecture’s biggest insight was that “people in cartels are banging down the door to confess. It’s amazing.” Alexander also enjoyed that Barnett spoke of the connection between antitrust and the world of sports.

Barnett also recognized that Nebraska is filled with sports aficionados and explained why college football plays on Saturdays, and the NFL on Sundays. Congress created an exemption for NFL antitrust, provided that they play games only on Sundays during the college football season. This cleared up Saturdays so that NCAA college teams, such as the Huskers, would not need to compete for airtime with professional sports.

Judge Daniel Beckwith: International Law in Bosnia

Judge Daniel Beckwith visited the Law College and spoke on his experiences in international law in Bosnia.

Beginning in 2004, Beckwith managed a national war crime trial monitoring unit in Bosnia, after war crimes trials were moved there from the International Criminal Tribunal for the former Yugoslavia. He has analyzed over 30 war crime trials, provided judiciary training and served as a media spokesperson for the Bosnian War Crimes Report.

Beckwith described the challenges of instituting courts for criminal and human rights crimes in post-conflict Bosnia. After such conflicts, it becomes difficult to do justice.

First, the criminal procedure code needs to be rewritten, which limits the court’s ability to rely on precedent or legislative history. Second, new and reinstituted judges must be taught their role in an independent judiciary. Fact finding is problematic as many people have left the country or do not want to testify. For those recovering from conflict, the trials attempt to do justice, and for all, there is a need to hear the people’s testimony to aid the process of closure. According to Beckwith, the American lawyers helping in the process often do not have the necessary training and experience to achieve optimal results in Bosnia.

Judge Beckwith is from Nebraska and was a trial judge for the 6th Judicial District of Nebraska from 1976 until 2004.

Donald C. Farber: Author, Entertainment Lawyer & Literary Agent

Donald C. Farber, '50, spoke about his experiences as an entertainment lawyer and literary agent during a visit to his alma mater. He began by remarking that his job in entertainment law entails mostly going to theater. But, he considers this better than reading law books, at least most of the time.

Working in show business, he noted, involves "putting deals together." The occupation does not depend on the interpretation of cases; it is "simply" formulating agreements.

Farber considered himself lucky to have fallen into the business when off-Broadway shows were just beginning. He offered three tenets that one should know about show business before diving in. First, everyone's paranoid. This is because 85 percent of actors in New York, for example, are not employed. Second, it is an ego biz. Nevertheless, one must live with conflicts of interest when drafting documents for parties, working for what Farber calls a "community of interest." Third, it is a sexist business in many respects.

Farber explained the basic outline of his job, which is getting everything ready to get a play produced. There are numerous types of agreements that must be drafted and negotiated, including option agreements, co-production agreements and associate producers agreements. Such agreements and preparations must satisfy securities laws, and Farber noted that all such organizations are formed as limited liability companies. From that point, one need only obtain a cast and crew and find a theater. He contends that the first and most important aspect is acquiring capital funds.

"Raising the money for the show is 88 percent of the job, the other 12 percent is hiring the right people," he stated. Eventually, however, one learns the people to know and how to comport with pertinent laws.

Farber also detailed his project, The Fantasticks, a two-act play, which ran for 42 years and earned tremendous profits. He also commented on drafting error in The Fantasticks, a statement that income would be paid for certain period "from the close of the show." This became a real issue, since the show played for 42 years.

Josephine Potuto: NCAA Infractions and Athletic Boosters

Is giving a Nebraska football player a free lunch an NCAA violation? The Nebraska Entertainment and Sports Law Association invited Prof. Jo Potuto to explain NCAA infractions and athletic boosters. Potuto is the University's faculty athletic representative to the NCAA and the Big 12 Conference.

Potuto said the NCAA Infractions Committee only has authority over member universities and not over individual boosters. Similarly, the NCAA cannot impose penalties on an individual coach but might tell the university that the coach will not be allowed to do off-campus recruiting if there were past violations. A booster with no formal association with the university is farther removed from NCAA sanctions, but the university can still be held responsible.

At an infraction hearing, boosters have no right to be present. If boosters were allowed to appear, Potuto said, the "big money boosters" would arrive with counsel explaining how they did nothing wrong, while the rest of the boosters would be unable to attend. Bigger boosters are more likely to be known by the university and, thus, are more likely to be held responsible. For example, when Alabama denied knowledge of a booster in a recent case, the booster's many athletic privileges called the university's veracity into question.

When asked whether a school like Creighton should be held to a different compliance standard than a larger school like UNL, Potuto replied, "If you want to play with the big boys, you need to be held to the same standard. If you want the benefits of Division I, you need to match the compliance required."

Amy Miller and Kevin Hasson: The Constitutionality of Religious Symbols on Public Lands

Should the village hall display a Nativity scene around Christmas? Should the Lancaster County Courthouse display the Ten Commandments as guiding principles? The Federalist Society invited Nebraska ACLU attorney Amy Miller, '96, and Kevin Hasson of the Beckett Fund for Religious Liberty to debate the constitutionality of religious symbols on public lands.

Miller stated that the ACLU seeks to prevent the government from endorsing any religion. This has led governments to place secular items alongside religious displays in order to make them more likely constitutional. She highlighted one location where officials placed a gingerbread man peering through a window at the baby Jesus to "secularize" the display. Miller also stated that the Ten Commandments should not be displayed on public lands because, while they encompass guiding principles, different religions have different versions of the Commandments. Admitting the ACLU's stance is often controversial, Miller read letters complete with expletives criticizing the ACLU's position.

Alternatively, Hasson believes that a diversity of religion in public must be endorsed. He finds that religion should be viewed alongside race and ethnicity. Hasson said ethnic parades and holidays do not create government endorsement for any particular group. He said it's "common sense" that one wouldn't protest a St. Patrick's Day parade on behalf of non-Irish and that "a foundation of democracy is to hear and see things you disagree with."

Miller calmly disagreed with this diversity stance, stating that allowing all religions a place would lead to public photos of aborted fetuses and Rastafarians bringing marijuana more into the culture.

"Both Miller and Hasson presented their arguments in such a manner that recognized and respected the positive and negative aspects of the opposing opinion," said Lisa Morinelli, '08. Currently enrolled in Constitutional Law, Morinelli found the debate pertinent to the class and "an illustration of the practical application of the law in today's world."

Patrick Garry: Corrupting the First Amendment: The Consequences of Granting Highest Constitutional Protection to Non-Political Speech or Why Hugh Hefner Has More Rights Than Cindy Sheehan

Children around the world are able to play an online video game called Super Columbine Massacre RPG. In this game, players utilize semiautomatic weapons to shoot down people in the Columbine school cafeteria. Controversial video games often spur heated debates on censorship and limits to free speech. Likewise, some question whether the free speech rights of vocal dissenters such as Cindy Sheehan should be regulated.

Dr. Patrick Garry, law professor at University of South Dakota School of Law who has a Ph.D in constitutional history, explained the importance of free speech and how current policies could harm political speech. Garry, invited by the Federalist Society, has published seven books, including Rediscovering a Lost Freedom: The First Amendment Right to Censor Unwanted Speech.

Garry stated that the classical argument regarding free speech postulates that we must protect low-value speech to truly protect high-value speech. Thus, even though one court opinion stated that an estimated 29 million children viewed adult programming each year, courts have declined to impose any burdens on this type of speech.

Under the marketplace-of-ideas model, the rationale of protecting speech is that the social truth needed for self-government can only arise from an open competition of ideas. Thus, we must increase the volume of ideas to maximize the diversity of thoughts. While the marketplace model once was concerned with a relatively small supply of ideas, Garry said with the Internet and cable, “we are flooded with ways to find information,” ways that often drown out political speech and place an emphasis on celebrity headlines and sports scores. For example, moments before Garry spoke about this rising concern, some news web sites featured headlines such as “Cameron Diaz: Photog tried to run me down,” glossing over global warming and controversial speeches at the United Nations.

Garry finds video games a good example of legislative backlash against current free speech doctrine. States regularly pass legislation to reduce perceived indecency in video games, and courts repeatedly strike them down. Garry proposes that, given the realities of our media society, the First Amendment should split political and non-political speech, giving political speech the highest constitutional protection. This two-tiered model would correspond with both history and the intent of the Framers, but also makes the rationale real that political speech is at the heart of the First Amendment. Concerns arise on how to differentiate the types of speech, but courts have already made differentiations between fact and opinion in defamation cases and between facts and ideas in copyright law.

Jim Huffman: A Public Purpose Is Not a Public Use: Why the Supreme Court Got It Wrong in Kelo

When should the government be able to take your home? The Federalist Society invited Prof. Jim Huffman of Lewis and Clark Law School in Portland, Ore., to discuss the ramifications of the recent Supreme Court case Kelo v. New London and the power of eminent domain in our society.

When an area is economically depressed, Huffman said, the state might seek to step in and buy the property in order to encourage future economic prosperity. However, what happens if the landowners do not want to sell their homes and businesses for only “just compensation”? It is an easier case when the government needs to take land for an important public highway or railroad. But, in Kelo, the United States Supreme Court said it was constitutional for a city to take land and sell it to a private developer as part of an integrated development plan designed to revitalize an ailing economy, as long as the taking was not designed to confer a private benefit on any particular private party.

The Court found that, if a community would enjoy the general benefits of economic growth, it is a sufficient public use for the government to take the property under the Fifth Amendment. Huffman finds Justice Stevens’ opinion in Kelo to be “troubling.” While the term ‘public use’ was generally defined as what the legislature views to be a public use, Stevens incorrectly blends the terms ‘public use’ and ‘public purpose’ together, Huffman said.

This issue has resulted in political action across the nation. In Kelo, there were about 40 amicus briefs filed. The case has spurred 12 ballot initiatives in 2006 and hundreds of law articles in the last two years. “I don’t know if I can think of another case that generated such across the board political response,” Huffman said.

Prof. Michael Heise of the Cornell Law School in Ithaca, N.Y., explained that legislative reform efforts such as the No Child Left Behind Act are fraught with unintended legal and policy consequences. Heise presented his thesis on October 9, 2007, at the College of Law, with support from the Winthrop and Frances Lane Foundation.

No Child Left Behind, said Heise, involves all districts in the country in an attempt to decrease achievement gaps and expand school accountability for student progress. Schools must show academic progress or face escalating consequences. However, the states can self-define their assessment standards. States can also decline participation, but must then also decline financial incentives.

Every state participates in the No Child Left Behind, but courts have held that participation is not mandated. The state of Michigan has argued that No Child Left Behind requires costs not covered by the act. Heise noted, however, that the costs cannot be too great if all states continue to participate.
Policy consequences of the act flow from the legal consequences. As states aimed for the top, they began "jockeying for position," which resulted in increased standards on school achievement," Heise said.

If states diluted performance standards, it could increase the chance of a state to navigate safely through No Child Left Behind with minimal financial consequences. The mandate of state testing limits this concern, Heise said. The existence of a national test can show whether the state's assessment standards fall above, at or below national standards.

As to Nebraska, "it's like a perfect storm here in the last calendar year," Heise said. Nebraska's approach to achievement leads to a higher pass rate than is reflected by the national test. Parents and leaders need to decide what to do with the gap between exam scores for Nebraska children and whether utilizing a set national test alone could benefit or harm.

There is also concern that the act restricts the curriculum and that teachers will be forced to teach to the test and emphasize rote memorization. Heise advises, however, that the goal should be not to conform to a set test, but to create the best test possible to advance education. Despite potent concerns, Heise insists there is a strong place for the No Child Left Behind Act in the nation's educational structure.

"- Jennifer Roback Morse: Authentic Feminism: Having It All, Eventually

Feminism must uphold the values of women without denigrating men, said Jennifer Roback Morse, a former professor of economics at Yale University and the author of Love and Economics: Why the Laissez-Faire Family Doesn't Work, in her presentation at the Law College, which was sponsored by The Federalist Society.

Morse said that the image feminists filter to society is that men and women are identical, "except that women are better," and that it is almost criminal to suggest that men and women can have prominent differences.

However, Morse suggested that men and women are indeed different and should work together in collaboration. She suggested that this model of complement and collaboration will lead to a better future than one of pure gender competitiveness.

Morse provided examples that men and women are different from early child development. For example, boys and girls respond differently to daycare and these differences exist in social interactions throughout adulthood.

Morse suggested that women should be allowed to finish school sooner by moving educational systems from age-based to achievement-based so that women can harness their abilities to learn quicker and be ready for motherhood "during their childbearing peak years" in their twenties. In addition, Morse believes a more flexible labor market is needed so that women can return to school or work after having children. Finally, Morse also suggested a larger element of fault brought into divorce proceedings to strengthen the importance of stability in marriage and allow women to take career chances they might not take if they believe their husbands might leave them.

Charles Ogletree: All Deliberate Speed

Harvard University Law Professor Charles Ogletree came to speak at the College of Law with a long list of accolades and personal achievements spanning several decades. Ogletree is a prominent legal theorist who has dedicated his life to looking at the Constitution to examine people's rights and how history has shaped our country. While presenting historical revelations in the context of Brown v. Board of Education, Ogletree also promoted his new book, All Deliberate Speed: Reflections on the First Half Century of Brown v. Board of Education.

Ogletree's main goal, he said, is "to show that Brown opened the doors for people to be successful." Using historical summaries of prominent Blacks who were either harmed by racism or devoting their lives to ending it, Ogletree reminded those in attendance of a quote by Charles Hamilton Houston: "A lawyer is either a social engineer or a parasite."
Social engineering can be done through empirical research. Ogletree showcased work by Robert L. Carter, whose psychological studies of children's preference of dolls was cited in the Brown decision. While empirical research is still introduced in courts today through testimony and amicus curiae briefs, courts continue to question its validity.

Among the historical figures discussed by Ogletree, Emmet Till brought about some of the most emotional responses from those in attendance. Till, a black man, was killed after he was caught whistling at a white woman in 1955. His mother released harrowing pictures of his corpse to the media, which were shown during the lecture, to show what was still happening in society. Till's story has been told in the film The Untold Story of Emmett Louis Till.

Ogletree also focused upon the role of education in America. Before Brown, W.E.B. DuBois explained, "The Negro needs neither separate nor mixed schools. What he needs is Education." This statement, made two decades before Brown, captured the notion that it is not the place but what is in it that is important, said Ogletree.

Ogletree said Brown's consequences were not all positive. Some 38,000 black teachers and administrators lost their jobs in Southern states. Black schools were closed down, and the teachers were told they were no longer needed. This wasn't a question of the teachers' qualifications, as 85 percent of minority teachers had college degrees, a higher percentage than whites.

Prof. Susan Poser asked how Ogletree viewed the current Omaha schools proposal advocated by Sen. Ernie Chambers. Ogletree said that when he first heard of the Omaha proposal, it sounded outrageous because it returns to discriminatory "separate but equal" ideas. However, Ogletree said that, as a citizen, there is an intellectual question: "Is Chambers saying that if integration isn't helping the urban community, can he work it out so that his community receives short-term benefits?"

Ogletree said that the proposal "probably won't survive any legal challenge because it's race-specific," but it has woken-up legislators to provide services to children who need it most.

Ogletree has been part of efforts to re-emphasize education in low-income communities. In one summer, Bell Scholars gained six months of reading and math skills, compared to the two months of regression experienced by most children during the summer. In addition, parents and teachers noted improvements in self-esteem and social skills.

As Ogletree said at the end of his lecture, "It is a question of when will we be able to embrace that we are one nation indivisible, with liberty and justice for ALL, and it is not just a matter of red state or blue state or Republican or Democrat."

College's Diversity Programs Receive NSBA's Visionary Awards

The College of Law's efforts at promoting diversity in the legal profession were recognized by the Nebraska State Bar Association with awards presented at the 2006 Barristers' Ball. Receiving Visionary Awards were the College's Pre-Law Institute, a summer program funded by the Law School Admissions Council that exposes minorities and other under-represented populations to the promises and challenges of a career in law, and Charles E. Wright, '58, who is the primary sponsor of the College's Native American Education Forum, which promotes the importance of a legal education to the Native American community. The Barristers' Ball was held in honor of the Bar's Nebraska Minority and Justice Implementation Committee.

Courtroom Host to Boswell's Military Promotion Ceremony

The Welpton Courtroom at the College of Law has hosted trials, classes, competitions and plays, but on April 12, 2006, it was the site for a truly unique event — a military ceremony for Charlotte Downey Boswell, '07, who was promoted to the rank of captain in the United States Air Force. She was also presented with the Military Outstanding Service Medal.

The ceremony included the presentation of the colors by the University's ROTC Honor Guard and the singing of the National Anthem by ROTC cadets Samantha Veal and Jason Parsons. Col. Robert R. Tovado presided over the ceremony and administered the oath to Boswell. Also speaking was Boswell’s husband, Capt. Mike Boswell, who lamented that he would no longer be able to pull rank on his wife or make her call him ‘sir’. Charlotte Boswell said that she decided to have the ceremony at the courtroom because it was “a place that represented my future,” as an Air Force JAG officer. “Many of the things I will do as a JAG will pull from experiences at the Law College with my peer, faculty and staff members. I greatly value the foundation these experiences have provided me.” Another reason she thought that it was appropriate that the ceremony be held at the College was to provide members of the Law College community who may have never seen

Dramatic Basement Flood Not No. 1 Disaster

On November 13, 2006, a water pipe broke in the basement of the Law College, releasing 300-400 gallons of water per minute. By the time the water could be turned off, about 30,000-40,000 gallons of water flooded the student lounge and locker areas, reaching a depth ranging from about 1-3 inches. It was a very dramatic sight, but the water was clean and clear so it is difficult to get a sense of it in pictures. The building’s staff worked quickly and efficiently to remove the water, and it appears there will be no long-term damage.

Classes were cancelled for the day. Dean Willborn made the following report to students in the next issue of the Sounding Block, the bi-weekly Law College newsletter:

You have now all lived through one of the Law College’s all-time, top-ranked disasters. Congratulations. I’m sorry to report, however, that I think the flood can only rank second or third on the list, at best. (I’ve only been here 27 years; who knows what horrible things might have happened in 1895 or 1926.)

By my lights, the top-ranked disaster was the fire of 2002. This occurred during construction of what is now the North Hallway. It was a slow burn, rather than a raging fire. As a result, I have no great picture of billowing flames, for which I am thankful.

This was a bigger disaster than our recent affair for two reasons. First, a fire produces both fire damage and water damage, compared to a flood which produces only water damage. Second, we were not able to get rid of the smell of the fire for months. So far, fingers crossed, we do not think there will be any long-lasting effects like that resulting from the flood.

I can’t talk about the fire without mentioning that Prof. John Lenich gets some of the ‘credit’ for this disaster. He was working late that night and thought he smelled something funny. So he called the police. Twice. Then went home for the night. Later that evening, the fire occurred. Let this be a warning: If you smell fire, you should call the fire department, not the police. I hope Prof. Lenich reads this in case he’s forgotten the central lesson of that night in 2002.

The second-ranked disaster would have to be the mold problem in January 1999. One day, there was suddenly a sour odor in the Dean’s Office. Worse even than what normally emanates from those quarters. Eventually, we determined that there was a serious mold problem coming from the vents that go underground from the basement, across the floor under the student lounge, and then up into the Dean’s Office and Room 106. The Dean’s Office was entirely vacated. The administrative staff was scattered in spare offices around the building. Dean Nancy Rapoport was located in a tiny office near the back of the library. Many people in the building fell ill. Many people looked for and found jobs elsewhere. As you might guess, I have no pictures of this disaster — and John Lenich bears no part of the blame. But it was a big problem.

Thus, I am sorry to say that our flood, dramatic though it was, can only rank no better than third on the all-time list. Which just goes to show that sometimes it is better not to be Number One.
a formal military ceremony "an insight into our world. Our ceremonies are rich in tradition, handed down through the generations. They serve to bond military members together, remind us of our heritage and honor our accomplishments."

Advocacy of Shanks Family Inspires Gradwohl's Artwork

As part of the Lincoln Arts Council's Stories of Home Project, the Multi-Cultural Legal Society and the Black Law Students Association co-sponsored a display of the artwork entitled "All Deliberate Speed" at Varner Hall from August 25, 2006 to September 8, 2006. Ann Gradwohl, daughter of Prof. John Gradwohl, '53, and Judge Jan Gradwohl, '54, created the artwork, which was inspired by the life of Lela Knox Shanks.

Shanks, along with her husband, Hughes Shanks, was active in the civil rights movement, and the artwork captured the Shanks family's fight for better education for not only their own children, but for all African Americans.

A special reception for law students, faculty and members of the community was held on Thursday, August 31, 2006, at Varner Hall to view the artwork and hear Gradwohl and Shanks speak about the artwork and the story behind it. University of Nebraska President James B. Milliken gave the opening remarks, followed by Dr. Sonya Smith, associate to the president and assistant vice president for academic affairs for diversity, who spoke about what it meant to have this artwork displayed in the University's administration building.

Gradwohl shared her story about the creative process for the artwork, before turning the program over to Shanks who spoke about her life and the struggles her family had faced in education and employment due to segregation. She powerfully spoke of her husband Hughes' struggle to find a job in the legal field after law school because he was consistently refused job applications based on his race.

In her artist's statement, Gradwohl explained what her artwork, inspired by the advocacy of Hughes and Lela Shanks, represents:

"To express visually racial stereotyping and profiling have been allowed to exist, I have elected to use two school desks. Each is painted the color of a common school writing implement. One is the graphite of pencils. The other is chalk. The chalk-colored desk, like our white majority culture, does not face directly the source of its support. This element of the work is intended to encourage members of the majority culture to expand their understanding of the stories of others and to act to make an inclusive and just community through which we may, together, push the human race forward.

"Etched into the desktop of the sculpture, as they are etched into the collective memory of those who seek racial equality, are the oxymoronic words used by the Supreme Court in the Brown decision, 'all deliberate speed.' This text is imposed over footage of the August 28, 1963, March on Washington for Jobs and Freedom."

Class of ’76 Donates Artwork for Student Lounge

On September 29, 2006, the recently refurbished student lounge at the College of Law was the site of the unveiling of an eye-catching work of art donated by the Class of 1976 on the occasion of its 30th class reunion.

Larry Roots’ “Laws of Nature” is a work of art composed of 57 squares in three rows. In the words of the artist, “This artwork functions on two levels...upclose as an individual perspective, and afar, as a diverse pattern and matrix...This concept illustrates the importance of individualism within a global society. ‘The whole is the sum of the parts.’”

Class members Gene Crump and Bob Bartle explained the inspiration for the gift in a letter to their classmates. They wrote: “When we moved to the new Law College on East Campus, it was new and modern and bereft of art, history and soul. The Class of ’76 supplied the soul for many law school challenges and activities by our engagement, involvement and perseverance. History was made by our success in University, regional and national legal competitions. We left the school a better place after our graduation....The law school has remodeled the library, courtroom, classrooms and student lounge after 30 years of intensive use. Dean Willborn has sought works of art to be placed around the school to add life and energy to the building, faculty and students who followed in our footsteps. It would be appropriate if our class (the first class to start as seniors in the new law school and graduate) would present to the law school a symbolic piece of art work in the student section of the building in our name for all of our living and deceased classmates.”

In their letter, Crump and Bartle asked the Class of ’76 to recall the life works of their deceased classmates: Mark Behm, Bob Cannon, Stan Foster, Gary Geese, Becky Glover and Doug Voegler.

Crump chaired a steering committee composed of Bob Bartle, Sam Brower, June Wagoner Edwards, Susan Jacobs, Tom Lamb and Keith Prettyman, among others, that was in charge of raising the funds needed to purchase the artwork. They hoped that the contributions would also allow the class to continue its contributing to the Becky Glover Library Fund and to help support the Client Counseling Competition, a program that began while they were students at the Law College.

Harner, Schutz Join Faculty

Rapoport Inspired Harner’s Love of Bankruptcy Law

She grew up in Canton, Ohio, the home of the football Hall of Fame. She is an avid fan of her law school alma mater’s football team, the Ohio State Buckeyes, as well as of the Cleveland Browns. So how has Michelle Harner adjusted to being a College of Law faculty member in Lincoln? “Well, we have Nebraska license plate holders on our car, we had season tickets for the football team and Alexandra, my two-year old, can say, ‘Go Big Red,’ quite nicely,” she said.

Harner’s path to the Law College went from Canton, to Boston College where she majored in English and political science, to Ohio State where she was executive editor of the law review, to serving as a law clerk for United States Bankruptcy Court Judge William T. Bodoh in Youngstown, Ohio, to law practice with the international law firm Jones Day in Cleveland and Chicago. But she has a Nebraska connection, as well. In law school she “fell in love with bankruptcy law” due, in large degree, to the influence of one of her mentors at Ohio State, Assistant Dean Nancy Rapoport, who would later become dean of the Law College in Nebraska. Rapoport, who taught bankruptcy and had been a bankruptcy practitioner, introduced her to the field and to Judge Bodoh, “and just talking with them about their experiences instilled a love of the practice in me.”

Bankruptcy law, Harner said, “was a nice fit for me because I really didn’t know whether I wanted to litigate or do transactional work and it was an area of law that allowed me to have the flexibility to experience both.

Farm Background Makes Ag Law Natural for Schutz

The College of Law does not often hire its own graduates to join the faculty, but it was fitting that when it did so recently, the College brought on board someone who was raised on a farm in the middle of the state, ten miles from Elwood (population 750), to teach Agriculture Law.

Anthony Schutz, ’03, grew up on a farm that at one time or another had dairy cattle, hogs and diverse crops. While Schutz did not see farming in his future, he did not envision himself a lawyer or law professor either. He was a Criminal Justice major at the University of Nebraska at Kearney, and he wanted to be a police officer. Thus he began his career path as a correctional officer for the Buffalo County Sheriff’s Office.

While Schutz enjoyed his experience there, he came to realize that it was not what he wanted to do long term. Having done well as an undergraduate student and on the LSAT and after talking to Peter Longo, ’83, a political science professor at Kearney, he decided to go to law school to further his education in a way that would not limit his career choices and allow him to “take the road wherever it goes.”

That the road led to law teaching was unexpected. On his way to graduating with highest distinction and being named editor-in-chief of the NEBRASKA LAW REVIEW, “even after the second year, I thought that after every exam I had not performed well so it was a continuing surprise throughout [that I did so well],” he said. After spending his first year “in the back of the library studying,” he found in types of legal practice.” At Jones Day, Harner joined the bankruptcy and restructuring practice and focused on corporate reorganization, including out-of-court refinancing and bankruptcy filings. She worked primarily on the company-debtor side but also did some creditor work for banking institutions and software and high tech companies that found themselves with customers in bankruptcy. It was exciting work. “Bankruptcy practice is very much an emergency room practice; you never quite know when a client is going to knock on your door;” she recalled. “Usually when they do, they’ve had their head in the sand for the past year or so. So you work around the clock to file in bankruptcy court in a matter of days.”

It was when she was at Jones Day’s Cleveland office that she met her husband, Paul Harner, who was then in Jones Day’s Columbus, Ohio office. Paul now practices with Paul, Hastings, Janofsky & Walker and is based out of the firm’s Chicago office.

After having practiced with Jones Day for almost 11 years and having made partner, Harner felt it was time to pursue another one of her ambitions that Rapoport and other faculty members at Ohio State had nurtured. “It was the right time to come back to the academic setting and teach and help train new young lawyers going into the field,” she said. She wanted more time to reflect and write and the flexibility to write on topics that interested her without the need to worry about potential conflicts between what she was writing and loyalty to the client she was serving.

The Harners have quickly come to love Lincoln, finding it a very warm and welcoming community. Michelle Harner also really enjoys teaching at the Law College. “I find the students very enjoyable, very intelligent and very insightful,” she said. “They’ve offered me new perspectives on issues I thought I knew backwards, forwards and upside-down.” In addition to Bankruptcy, she is teaching Professional Responsibility, Corporations, and Corporate Finance and Governance. The Corporate Finance course is new to the curriculum and focuses on valuing corporate entities and obtaining financing, as well as alternatives for managing corporate risk.

Her research agenda includes working on an article exploring a new cause of action being asserted against corporate directors and officers called “deepening insolvency,” which dovetails with the current debate revolving around the business judgment rule and whether the standards for directors and officers are too lax in light of Enron and other corporate scandals. She is also working on an article regarding the use of corporate debt by hedge funds to gain control of, or influence over, corporate governance matters.

his second and third years that one of the most valuable aspects of his law school experience was interacting and sharing ideas with other students and with the faculty. “I was always knocking on faculty doors talking to them about the subject matter,” he recalled.

Upon graduation, he clerked for two years with the Honorable C. Arlen Beam ’65, of the U.S. Court of Appeals for the Eighth Circuit. Then came another surprise. He was one of 12 people selected to interview for three clerking positions with U.S. Supreme Court Chief Justice William Rehnquist. Although he was not one of the three selected, he interviewed with the chief justice in his office on his first trip to Washington. “We talked for about 20 minutes,” Schutz said. “According to the chief justice, I was sitting on the couch that John Quincy Adams died on. That was the opening line of the interview.”

While clerking, he also taught Legal Research and Writing at the Law College. That confirmed his growing interest in law teaching. He jumped at the chance to interview for a regular faculty position. As part of the process, he had to present a paper to the faculty. “I started the job talk by saying that after three years of sitting in classrooms listening to my professors it looks like the table has turned. Now you have to sit and listen to me.”

Schutz was hired, but in accordance with a tradition when the Law College hires one of its own, he spent a year teaching at another institution. He spent the 2005-2006 academic year teaching in the Lawyering program at Cornell Law School, instructing a class similar to the Legal Research and Writing class he taught at the Law College.

Now he is in his first year of teaching in the same school he attended as a law student. The renovation of the building has made it feel not quite the same, and Schutz has had to get used to addressing his former professors by their first names. He has taught Agricultural Law, the Environmental Law and Water Resource Management Seminar, Land Use Planning and State and Local Government Law. Preparing to teach four courses for the first time has been a challenge, but he says he has enjoyed it and thinks the students enjoy his classes.

Schutz hopes to be part of another Nebraska tradition by co-authoring a casebook on Agriculture Law. The late Professor Norm Thorson was the author of the existing casebook in the field, which is now out of date.
Bradford’s Podcast Summaries Prove Popular with Students

You drop into the lounge chair at the pool, lay back and soak in the rays while you listen on your iPod to the soothing sounds of ... Prof. Steve Bradford discussing securities regulation?!? O.K., that may be taking it a little too far, but it is now possible, thanks to one of the latest law school innovations, podcasting.

For those of you who didn’t grow up with Macs and PCs, a podcast is simply a digital recording posted on the Internet. You can listen to it on your computer or download it and listen to it later on an iPod or mp3 player.

Bradford participated last spring in a podcasting project sponsored by the Center for Computer-Assisted Legal Instruction (CALI). Every week, he recorded a 15-20 minute summary of his Securities Regulation class and posted those recordings on the Web for anyone to access.

“A student could not have passed the exam just by listening to the summaries,” Bradford said, “but the podcasts did provide a good overview of what we were doing. That’s helpful because it’s such a complex regulatory course.”

Kacie Clarke, ’07, who took the class last spring, said, “Sometimes I would get lost in the details. It was helpful to hear the main points restated in the podcasts.” Matt Warner, ’07, said the podcasts helped him “bring the big picture together.”

Warner and Jake Hinkins, ’07, said the podcasts enabled them to fill in gaps and errors in their notes. According to Bradford, “Even the best students sometimes miss or misunderstand things in class. This gives them a check.”

The podcasts were popular with students not just at the Law College, but nationwide. CALI surveyed all students whose professors were participating in the project. About three-quarters of them said the podcasts were of excellent or above average value, and almost 80 percent said they would like future law school classes to use podcasting. Almost 40 percent of the students surveyed said they listened to most or all of the podcasts, even though 76 percent of them had never listened to a podcast before.

“I didn’t know if students would use the podcasts or not,” Bradford said, “but I didn’t see any harm in trying it. As it turned out, the students liked it and used it. I had a total of 1,484 hits on the web site. That’s over 80 hits per posting, and I only had 24 students in the class.”

Hinkins sometimes listened to the podcasts as he drove. “Surprisingly,” he said, “it didn’t even cause road rage. At least no more than usual.” Warner, who sometimes listened to the podcasts late at night before he went to bed, joked that “the only downside was I would have nightmares about the Howey test” (one of the tests used to determine whether an investment is a security).

What’s next? “I haven’t hit the Billboard charts yet,” Bradford said, “but I’m hoping for a recording contract. And then I want to tour with Maroon 5.” Until that happens, Bradford said he plans to expand the podcasting experiment to other courses. He also may add video. “I use PowerPoint slides in class and, even before PowerPoint came along, I have always been a strong believer in the power of diagrams and flowcharts to teach. So why not add slides to the podcasts for people who learn better visually?”

C. Steven Bradford
Earl Dunlap
Distinguished Professor of Law
- Prof. Steve Bradford was elected to serve as president-elect of the UNL Academic Senate for the 2006-2007 academic year and as president for the 2007-2008 academic year.

Susan D. Franck
Assistant Professor of Law
- Prof. Susan Franck spoke at the British Institute of International and Comparative Law’s Conference on Procedural Aspects of Investment Treaty Arbitration where she focused her remarks on choice of law in international dispute resolution. She also made presentations at Catholic University of America’s Columbus School of Law and Hamline University School of Law where she addressed issues related to the design of dispute resolution systems for investment-related conflict. Franck also wrote “Foreign Direct Investment, Investment Treaty Arbitration and the Rule of Law,” which is forthcoming in the Pacific McGeorge Global Business and Development Law Journal; “Sanctions for Frivolous Challenges to Arbitration Awards” in the ABA’s International Arbitration News, which was reprinted in Transnational Dispute Management; and “Transforming into an International Lawyer,” published in the ILSA Quarterly. She is currently at work on two writing projects. One addresses the potential interaction between dispute systems design and investment treaty conflict; the other provides an empirical analysis of investment treaty arbitration awards.

This fall, Franck was named as a “New Voice” by the American Society of International Law. She will be speaking at the society’s annual meeting this spring. She also was instrumental in organizing the College’s symposium on “The Modern Legacy of William Jennings Bryan.”

Prof. Michelle Harner recently spoke at a National Business Institute seminar entitled Bankruptcy Reform Update — One Year Later and has been invited to participate in a panel discussion regarding the legal theory of deepening insolvency at the annual meeting of the American Bankruptcy Institute in Washington, D.C. Harner currently is working on an article analyzing the utility of deepening insolvency (a theory that seeks to hold directors, officers and others associated with a troubled company liable for actions taken while the company was insolvent) in corporate America. She also co-authored and published a book chapter entitled “Enforceability of Contractual Restrictions on Disposition of Property” in Bankruptcy Business Acquisitions (2d ed.) published by the American Bankruptcy Institute.

Prof. Colleen Medill completed the manuscript for the second edition of her casebook, Introduction to Employee Benefits Law: Policy and Practice. The book, which will be published by Thomson-West in 2007, has been used in 25 law schools around the country. Medill was awarded a $30,000 research grant from the Center for Retirement Research at Boston College and the Social Security Administration for her research study of participant perceptions and decision-making concerning retirement plan benefits. The study involves a survey of former participants in the Nebraska Public Employees Retirement System. She is working with the Nebraska Public Employees Retirement System and researchers from the UNL Bureau of Sociological Research to conduct the survey. Medill also spoke to the faculty at the University of Missouri-Columbia School of Law on “ERISA Preemption and the Future of Federal and State-level Initiatives for Health Care Reform.”

Richard E. Moberly
Assistant Professor of Law

William H. Lyons
Richard H. Larson Professor of Tax Law

Prof. Bill Lyons taught United States Income Taxation of Individuals at the University of Leiden (Holland). It was his second time teaching in this International Masters in Taxation program. Lyons was also elected to a second three-year term to the American College of Tax Counsel as Eighth Circuit regent and was selected as managing editor of The Tax Lawyer, the ABA Tax Section’s law review journal. Lyons will teach Comparative Wills, Trusts and Estates at the Kansas-Nebraska summer program at the University of Limerick in the summer of 2007.

Prof. Medill an ERISA Hottie?

Did you know that the College of Law is the home of one of the most beautiful pension-and-employee-benefit attorneys in America? Prof. Colleen Medill was one of 12 nominees in the first annual ERISA Lawyer Hotties Contest run by Above the Law, an internet website that takes a behind-the-scenes look at the world of law.

According to the testimonial of her mystery nominee, “Colleen is highly attractive. She’s not smouldering hot, in some ‘tacky centerfold’ sort of way. Instead, she is exceedingly pretty, in the tasteful, professional, dignified way that one would expect of an ERISA attorney. And this is why she deserves to be the number one ERISA hottie: she is undoubtedly ‘hot,’ but in a manner consistent with the statutory framework.”

Medill has made her mark as an ERISA scholar in many ways, but this particular accolade was unexpected. But she is flattered. “Whoever nominated me was kind and sincere. I like to think it was a former student in my ERISA class,” she said.
Josephine R. Potuto
Richard M. Larson Professor of Constitutional Law
— Prof. Jo Potuto has been named chair of the NCAA Division I Committee on Infractions. Along with James O’Hanlon, a professor at the University’s College of Education and Human Sciences, she published on the NCAA website a monograph, National Study of Student Athletes Regarding Their Experiences as College Students, describing the results of their survey of student athletes at 18 Division I schools. The monograph can be found at http://www.ncaa.org/library/research/student-athlete-experiences/2006/2006_s-a_experience.pdf.

How You Can Support the Law College

The University of Nebraska College of Law has a long history of support from alums, corporations, foundations and friends. We are grateful for the generosity. However, in order to maintain the high quality of our academic programs and remain a leader among the nation’s universities, we must attract increasing support from those who believe in our ability to transform the lives of students and contribute positively to society. In an era of decreasing state appropriations and higher and higher tuition costs, private gifts are essential to our ability to excel. While private dollars do not replace other revenue, they are a catalyst for the extraordinary.

The following are a few examples of ways you can support the College of Law today and in the future:

1. Create an endowed fund
   Your principal is invested and only the investment income is used. The advantage of this method is the fund grows over time, providing increasing support for the University and a lifetime of giving.

2. Designate the University as a beneficiary on life insurance
   You can name the University of Nebraska Foundation as the owner or beneficiary of an existing policy or a new one. You may also choose to assign your dividends to the Foundation.

3. Establish a charitable gift annuity
   This allows you to convert an asset with a low or fluctuating yield into a secure fixed return for the balance of your lifetime with the remainder benefitting your area of interest at the University of Nebraska.

4. Donate real estate or appreciated stock
   Farms, personal residences, condos or investment property are often donated to the University because of the tax benefits to the donor. Appreciated stocks, bonds or mutual funds can also be donated, providing a charitable deduction for the full fair market value of the securities.

5. Direct your IRA to a fund that benefits the college
   Direct your IRA manager to transfer funds directly to the University of Nebraska Foundation and receive an exclusion from gross income up to $100,000 per year.

I would be happy to help you with any of these options. Please contact me if you need more information or to get the process started. I can be reached at 402-458-1192 or ahohensee@nufoundation.org.

Memorial gift reminder:
Please make memorial gifts payable to the University of Nebraska Foundation to benefit the College of Law.

Alumni Council Awards Honor Distinguished Achievements

The College of Law Alumni Council presented four Distinguished Achievement Awards at a dinner at the Lincoln Country Club in April 2006. The awards recognized the many outstanding contributions made to the College by its alumni, faculty, students and friends.

- Distinguished Alumni Award was awarded to Judge Laurie Smith Camp, '77, for rare distinction in professional achievement. Presenting her award were Judge William Jay Riley, '72, and Judge Richard Kopf, '72. Judge Smith Camp is the first woman to serve as judge on the Federal District Court for the District of Nebraska. While at the Law College, Smith Camp was editor-in-chief of the Nebraska Law Review. In his remarks about Smith Camp, Judge Kopf explained why he, not Judge Smith Camp, was the first woman judge on the court.

- Woods & Aitken/Alumni Council Outstanding Student Award was presented to Chris Riffle, '06, by Professor Susan Poser. Riffle was president of the senior class and served as research editor for the Nebraska Law Review. A native of Washington state, Riffle is an associate with the Koley Jessen firm in Omaha.

- Distinguished Faculty Award was presented to Prof. William H. Lyons by Kim Robak, '85. Lyons joined the faculty in 1981 and is highly regarded as both a teacher and scholar in tax law. He is a fellow of the American College of Tax Counsel, a member of the ABA Section of Taxation and has published widely on tax issues. He has also won many teaching awards.

- Outstanding Service Award was presented to Claire and Charlene Johnson by Frank J. Barrett '59. Claire Johnson, '58, is a partner with Parker Milliken in Los Angeles. He has been a fellow in the prestigious American College of Trial Lawyers since 1979. While at the Law College, he was a member of the Nebraska Law Review, argued on the national moot court team and served as senior class president and SBA president.
Highly Motivated Doctors Whitted, Raines Find Law Degree ‘Extraordinarily Valuable’ in Their Medical Practices

By Terri Bierbower

Though they graduated five years apart, Edward Raines, ‘80, and Peter Whitted, ’75, have a few things in common. The two men attended the University of Nebraska-Lincoln in the 70’s, and both attained a Bachelor of Arts degree. They continued their education at the College of Law, and upon graduation, both went on to medical school at the University of Nebraska Medical Center in Omaha - Whitted graduated in 1979 and Raines in 1984. But this is where the similarities end: Dr. Raines specializes in adult and pediatric thoracic surgery and adult cardiac surgery, while Dr. Whitted is a specialist in external ocular disease, anterior segment, cataract and laser surgery and vision correction surgery.

Raines remembers his first year of law school as one of the most demanding of his academic years. “My thought processes and some of the foundations of my life were truly challenged. I realized that I lived in a sequestered world and didn’t understand an open-minded manner of thinking,” he said. “But I wouldn’t trade my law degree for anything – the friendships that I made and also the fact that I successfully completed an intellectual challenge.”

Initially, Raines did not want to pursue a medical career. “My father practiced medicine; he worked so hard and was a high profile, well-known person in western Nebraska,” he said. But while working as a law clerk, Raines found himself more interested in the medical aspects of some malpractice cases. So his career plan changed to include medical school upon completion of his law degree.

Similarly, Whitted did not plan on medical school. “After my first year in law school, I determined that the tedium of the writing required by the legal profession would prevent me from enjoying the vocation,” he said. He continued law school and took a year off to complete the premed requirements. Whitted then finished his last year of law school, passed the bar examination and applied to medical school.

Both doctors commented on the selection of their specialties. During his cardiac surgery rotation, Raines was impressed with the clear difference in the patients’ conditions following surgery, and thought it would be gratifying to specialize in this field. “My specialty is formidable; Mother Nature is unforgiving and requires my best every day,” Raines said. “Any lapses will be rewarded with less than optimal outcomes.”

Raines has been practicing cardiothoracic surgery and heart transplantation in Lincoln since 1991, and in 1996 started the Artificial Heart Program at BryanLGH. In addition to his cardiac cases, he operates on lung cancer patients. “It has been astonishing to witness the development of artificial heart technology in the past ten years,” he said. “I think we are on the verge of artificial hearts that afford long-term support, providing a suitable, adequate and rewarding level of life.”

Whitted’s specialties in cornea and external disease as well as anterior segment surgery were those he “fell...”
A desire to improve the ophthalmology profession drives Whitted. He has been named to the Best Doctors in America list each year since 1996. Less than four percent of American doctors appear on this annual list. "We drink from a well we did not dig," he said. "It is our responsibility to leave our chosen profession better than we found it. I am involved in a number of activities in an attempt to improve the delivery and financing of healthcare to all Americans."

Whitted provides surgical services for Mission Cataract USA, and volunteers for organizations such as One World Health Center, Hope Medical Outreach Coalition, and the homeless screen with Prevent Blindness Nebraska. "There is an extraordinary need in America for eye care in underserved populations, and it is satisfying to make a small dent in that growing need," he said.

In addition, Whitted is a clinical instructor at the Med Center. "Students ask challenging questions that keep me on my toes," he said. "And some questions lead to changes in the paradigms that exist in all specialties. These changes emanate from students who move the profession and practice of medicine forward."

Recently, Whitted used his skills in China as a teacher with project Orbis. Orbis is a flying instructional eye hospital that emanated in Houston, Texas, in the early 1980s. Teachers fly to third-world countries and train local ophthalmologists to perform eye surgery successfully. "The most rewarding portion was the receptive medical population," said Whitted. "We were able to be inordinately successful in that environment."

Raines has a similar motivation - he is inspired to be among the best practitioners in his specialty. Proof of this achievement is the fact that he has been on the Best Doctors in America list every year since 1997. "I have taken on as my measuring stick of success those who are the finest in the country," he said. "Only by challenging yourself to be among the best do you achieve the highest standards."

Boyer’s ‘Most Rewarding Work’ Is for Nonprofit, Charitable Entities

By Terri Bierbower

As different as they are, Omaha’s Henry Doorly Zoo, the Boy Scouts of America and film production have something in common. John K. Boyer, ’69, is involved in each. But this is merely a glimpse at the community involvement Boyer takes pride in while he also serves as a managing partner and attorney at Fraser Stryker in Omaha.

While still in high school, Boyer decided his career path would involve the law. After graduating with a B.A. in Economics from Southern Methodist University in 1966, he attended the College of Law. The most memorable portion of his time at the Law College involved interaction with faculty and Dean Henry Grether. Two professors in particular had a profound effect on him – Dick Harnsberger and Larry Berger. "The nature of their classes, how they conducted themselves – they were outstanding teachers," Boyer said.

Since graduation and during his 38 years as an attorney, Boyer has seen the practice of law evolve significantly due to changes in technology. "We had no computers when I was in law school; now instant gratification is important. Because of cell phones, e-mail, scans and text messaging, an attorney is on-call all the time," Boyer said. "These venues for communication require an immediate diagnosis for the problem at hand. The convenience of giving thought to a response is not a luxury available today."

Boyer practices in the areas of business and corporate, taxation, estate planning, health care, governmental and administrative affairs, and nonprofit and charitable organizations.
patients in this region would like to have, and deserve.”

Much like his dedication to being unparalleled in his field, Raines strives for the same on the racetrack. At the insistence of a patient, Raines tried automobile racing reluctantly. He now competes weekly at Eagle Raceway, and has a dedicated pit crew and staff to cheer him on. “I have gained respect for a sport that prior to trying I had no idea existed or how difficult it could be,” he said. “It’s not only the technical aspects of driving, but also overcoming fear, all while driving at a high speed among a multitude of other cars trying to reach the front of the pack.”

Even though Raines never practiced law, it has assisted him in his career. “I understand problem solving and have an unbiased approach to the contemplation of issues,” he said. “Law school afforded me the opportunity to look at social, legal, religious and economic issues in a more enlightened way, and I have an open-minded approach to my medical career and to life in general.”

Whitted feels his law degree is indispensable as well. “I am lucky to have insight into two different professions, both of them extremely challenging and rewarding. I think a legal education encourages respect, not fear, of the law,” he said. “A legal education is extraordinarily valuable because it teaches a systematic approach to problem solving.”

For any students reading this article, Whitted has a few parting words of advice. “Understand that your legal education is an expanding rather than a limiting education. It is a stepping-stone to any arena and provides an extraordinary opportunity to succeed, with which comes an extraordinary responsibility. Make the most of it – this isn’t a dress rehearsal.”

“All of my areas of focus are challenging,” he said. “But the most rewarding is the work I perform for nonprofit and charitable organizations.”

He speaks especially of his positions as president, board member and attorney for both the Omaha Zoological Society and the Omaha Zoo Foundation. “Every one of my board positions is enjoyable,” Boyer said. “But this one is tremendously satisfying and extremely educational. We work together to make Omaha’s Henry Doorly Zoo one of the best zoos in the world.”

Other board positions include the University of Nebraska Foundation; Greater Omaha Chamber of Commerce; Peter Kiewit Institute of Information Science, Technology and Engineering; Omaha Performing Arts Society and Durham Western Heritage Museum.

But most impressive is the organization that Boyer has been involved with for 50 years – the Boy Scouts. At the age of 7, he became a Cub Scout, then a Boy Scout and finally an Eagle Scout. In order to earn the Eagle Scout rank, the highest advancement rank in scouting, a Boy Scout must fulfill requirements in the areas of leadership, service and outdoor skills.

A twist of fate allowed him to utilize his skills as an attorney while helping a program he found significant. The legal counsel for the Boy Scout Council, Bud Floersch, assisted a young Boyer with obtaining his merit badge on civics. Years later, Floersch died in the blizzard of 1975. The council asked Boyer to assume this position, one he continues to hold. His involvement carried on through the years – Boyer’s two sons were Eagle Scouts. And after two years as a chairman, he continues to serve on the Board of Trustees for the council. In addition, Boyer was given the 1996 Distinguished Eagle Scout Award, and he received a Citizen of the Year award in 2004.

The standards learned while in the Boy Scouts were especially meaningful. “The life values and skill sets I obtained were paramount in my life,” he said. “I still follow them today.”

Even with all the extracurricular choices young people have, he believes the Boy Scouts will always have a place in our society. “The Boy Scouts provide an opportunity for leadership, civic responsibility, social interaction, outdoor skills and becoming acclimatized to the environment,” Boyer said.

He had the chance to apply those abilities recently when he became involved in film production through a client relationship. Boyer was the executive producer for the film Lewis & Clark: Great Journey West and served as the production executive for Kilimanjaro: To the Roof of Africa. Both were shot in the IMAX format.

The former film is educational and therefore has “long legs,” a term used in the industry to indicate that its longevity is timeless. “It took a great deal of exploration and nearly two years to shoot utilizing all four seasons of the year. We were very thorough with the details, down to the buttons on the costumes,” Boyer said.

His newest project is a miniseries with HBO. Boyer estimates they will shoot two million feet of film to obtain the ten two-hour segments that will be aired. “I knew nothing about the movie business until I got involved,” he said. “It has been an amazing experience.”

‘Master’ Peterson Specializes in Affordable Housing

Even though she had a flat tire on her drive from Omaha to Lincoln, Patricia Schuett Peterson’s, ’79, return to the College of Law as part of Masters Week 2006 was a “wonderful experience.” Masters Week is an annual event at the University that connects distinguished graduates with current students.

Patti Peterson is well qualified to share her expertise and experience. An attorney in Kutak Rock’s Omaha office, Peterson practices in the area of municipal finance, working primarily with affordable housing issues.

She joined Kutak Rock’s securities department right out of law school. An entity had just been created by state law that could issue tax exempt bonds and loan funds at lower than the existing mortgage rates, which were quite high at the time. So Peterson was able to get in on the ground floor. The law was based on a provision of the Internal Revenue Code, which Peterson finds ironic because when she joined the firm she said she would do anything but tax work. But she found the work to be fun and rewarding. “Professor Berger was right,” she said thinking back on her tax class. “It’s not necessarily about the exact provisions of the Code, but the policy behind why the Code was written that way that’s important.”

In her job, Peterson has the opportunity to work with state housing agencies across the country. “I fondly refer to having a Wall Street practice here on the plains because I do what lawyers do who practice on Wall Street; it’s just that I do it in a much better environment – the State of Nebraska where public schools are great and homes are affordable,” she remarked.

Peterson enjoys her practice, which fits her personality. “I love being in charge. As bond counsel, that’s the role you play; it’s like being the conductor in an orchestra. You figure out who’s playing what part and what needs to be done to put the symphony together,” she said.

Returning to the Law College gave Peterson a chance to reflect on her law student days. “I probably looked like a law school geek,” she recalled, “because I loved law school. I was so enamored with the classes. Everything seemed so interesting.” Even though the work was “very hard,” she said the most rewarding part was “being in some adventure all together with 150 students and helping each other out and encouraging each other.” She remembers particularly an unusually warm February day when her Legal Process class convinced Prof. Rob Denicola that class time would be best spent playing softball. Some of her best friends are members of her law school class – people like Rick Berkshire, Paula Metcalf and Pam Mattson.

Masters Week is not the only opportunity that Peterson has had to relate to current students. She is also a member of Cather Circle where she and other alumnae of the University meet twice a year with women students. In both settings, the message she conveys to students is that the general education one receives as an undergraduate and a law student prepares one to venture out into areas that students do not even think about while in the midst of their education. “It was like I was told when I was here,” she said. “You were teaching me to think like a lawyer and that’s exactly what I needed to take the ball and run with it” in her practice. “It was what I learned here in terms of researching, analyzing, writing and communicating that enabled me to do what I do.”

Chancellor Harvey Perlman presented Patti Peterson with a medallion at Masters Week 2006.
Daniel A. Fullner, '79, was elected chair of the Nebraska State Bar Association's House of Delegates. Fullner is a partner in the Madison law firm Moyer, Moyer, Egley, Fullner & Montag.

Dedicated to the memory of
Paul Donald Brunner
December 21, 1980 - September 20, 2006

Paul Donald Brunner grew up in Scribner, Nebraska. After earning his degree in crimi­nal justice, Paul enrolled at the University of Nebraska College of Law. During law school, Paul made countless friends who remember him as a charismatic and positive person who inspired them to enjoy life. Paul's true passion was studying and discussing civil rights issues and upon graduation he wanted to work in the field. However, in September of 2006 Paul tragically died at the age of twenty-five from a sudden cardiac event. His death occurred just eight months before he was to receive his Juris Doctor degree. This memorial is a tribute to a wonderful son, brother, friend and colleague. May we never forget your enthusiasm for life.
