Purpose

There is growing realization that wildlife damage control is an integral part of wildlife management. In many areas, including the southeast, wildlife damage problems and complaints are increasing. Continuing human population expansion, spreading urbanization, and increasing wildlife populations are factors in this trend. Damage concerns involve not only agricultural, forestry and related interests, but also urban, suburban, and rural residents and the resource managers to whom they turn for help and advice.

There is a need for wildlife professionals to be fully informed about current problems and methods of wildlife damage control. Research, extension and agency personnel, both state and federal, are vitally concerned with these problems. However, many other professionals engaged in various facets of agriculture and natural resources management must be knowledgeable in this area. This conference was held to help fill the needs of practitioners dealing with these growing problems in the eastern United States.

About the Proceedings

The papers and abstracts of the proceedings were reproduced from camera ready materials provided by the authors. The quality of the published proceedings is a credit to the authors, who followed editorial directions very well and who painstakingly reviewed their papers. The proceedings contains only papers and abstracts submitted for publication; in a few instances authors did not provide papers or sent only an abstract, which would permit publication of their work in professional journals. Funds to support the publication were provided by North Carolina Wildlife Resources Commission, USDA Extension Service, USDA Forest Service and USDI Fish and Wildlife Service.

The proceedings does not include a very significant workshop on coyote control techniques presented Monday evening, September 23. The program was moderated admirably by Gary Simmons, US Fish and Wildlife Service. Presentors were F. Robert Henderson, Kansas State University and Dr. Guy Connolly, USDI Fish and Wildlife Service. The conference committee particularly thanks Dr. Connolly who filled in at the last minute for Dr. Bart W. O'Gara, Montana Cooperative Wildlife Research Unit, who could not make it to the meeting.
