Rap Music and Hip Hop on American College Campuses

Abstract

My session will cover how many young African Americans believe that Rap music and Hip Hop is more important and relevant today on college campuses than the Civil Rights movement, or learning about the great works'. But one must seriously question whether Rap music and/or the Hip Hop culture is more significant than the movement that gave most Americans in the United States a modicum of equality in our institutionally racist society.

From the outset, my presentation will discuss how Rap artists articulate a wide range of reactions and emotions toward the scope of institutional policing faced by many young black Americans. For example, the FBI tries to justify the targeting of Rap Artists by telling us that their songs allegedly advocate violence against police officers. Can we believe this assertion by the FBI?

Furthermore, one must ask: Is there a difference between the attacks made against black youth and white youth expression like with Heavy Metal Rockers on college campuses? Perhaps so.

Although it is true that young black men are as likely to be in prison as in college, Rap Music is a welcome articulation of the economic and social frustrations of these young blacks. Thus, Rap Music offers the release of artistic and creative expression and historical continuity in response to the disappointments many poor people face in our society today.

One must also ask: Will economic and social frustrations always be a part of the black community?

Blacks have never been really shocked by the persistence of racism, as they have been able to overcome many obstacles in the confines of the dominant society and White Supremacy. Indeed, black Americans should be commended for their survival tactics.

Therefore, Rap Music should be understood as the predominant symbolic voice of black urban males, as it heightens the scorn and white middle-class objections to young black Rap Artists, in general. Rappers, of course, do not aspire to be white or abide by middle-class standards, so many are vilified and are approached with hostility and suspicion by the dominant group and white authority.

Consequently, Rappers, their fans, and young, African Americans are construed as conspirators in the spread of black cultural influence. Some even see Rap Music as the most visible form of black American "cultural expression" in contemporary society. Hence, it is dangerous?

Moreover, Rap Music has been the most important media outlet through which millions of listeners and young people of all races have been able to vent their anger, resistance, frustration, and confusion about our society and the plight of African Americans as the subordinate under-class.

Ultimately, political interpretations of Rap Music's explosive, vulgar, graphic, and resistive lyrics are critical to understanding contemporary black cultural politics and what is happening on college campuses.

All these issues will be addressed during my presentation, as well as a discussion of the growing importance of Hip Hop and Rap Music subcultures.
