FROM STATUES TO SCULPTURE:

Unknown American, 19th Century. HORSE, n.d., wood, 27 1/2 x 26 x 6 in.

SELECTIONS FROM THE COLLECTION OF THE SHELDON MEMORIAL ART GALLERY AND SCULPTURE GARDEN

University of Nebraska-Lincoln
EIGHTH ANNUAL SHELDON STATEWIDE EXHIBITION, 1994-95
Carved from wood by an unknown American artisan in the 19th century, this stylized horse may have been an advertising device for a saddler or harness maker. Work of this type, termed folk art, was fashioned for practical use by people with little training save the art of making things by hand, an art that declined rapidly with the progress of the machine age. Discovered in upper New York state where it was displayed outdoors, our Horse has outlasted several coats of paint, a saddle, bridle and a tail, but retains the grace and firmness of form imbued by the carver. Notice the ears. From what material do you think they are made?

Tony Berlant studied painting as an art student at UCLA, but soon turned to the medium of collage. Still an undergraduate, he discovered in a soon-to-be demolished grocery store a heap of metal advertising signs, a material that would determine the direction of his work. Berlant began recycling words and images from commercial signs, nailing metal shapes to wood. The artist thinks of the patterns of brads (nails) as brushstrokes, "the hand of the absent maker made visible." Lily After Dark is an example of Berlant's little houses, a series of metal structures with narrative imagery on studded patchwork surfaces with bright, hard finishes.

Reminiscent of a Chinese puzzle, the intricately formed components of Tang evoke the artist's birthplace, Shanghai. The five curvilinear shapes may be arranged in various configurations to produce intriguing combinations of form and space. The Sculpture Garden of Sheldon Memorial Art Gallery on the UN-L City Campus includes a monumental public work by di Suvero, whose sculpture is installed in other outdoor spaces around the world. The artist describes his large sculptures as "painting in three dimensions with the crane as my paintbrush."

This powerfully moving figure with bowed head is a smaller version of the statue of Abraham Lincoln standing at the west entrance of the Nebraska State Capitol. French's Lincoln, a realistic portrait of one of America's heroic personalities, is modeled with the traditional techniques he employed to produce numerous public monuments, most notable the seated Abraham Lincoln in the Lincoln Memorial in Washington, D.C. Initially self-taught, the artist studied in Boston with John Quincy Adams Ward, whose work is included in this exhibition, but also in Paris and Italy.
FROM STATUES TO SCULPTURE

The title of this exhibition, From Statues to Sculpture, suggests the evolution of three-dimensional art, from 19th-century statues that inspire moral fortitude, celebrate historic events and invoke spiritual enlightenment, to sculpture that questions those verities and poses new definitions of reality. From Statues to Sculpture comprises 20 works dating from 1860 to 1988. This selection from the permanent collection of the Sheldon Memorial Art Gallery represents a diversity of issues and developments in American sculptural history, from historic monuments to abstract figuration, from images of landscape to architectural forms.

Sculpture is one of the oldest visual art media. It is found in all ancient cultures as both utilitarian and sacred objects. During the Renaissance sculpture was often intrinsic to architecture, incorporated with the structure to articulate the symbolic import of a cathedral or government building. In the United States, these traditions were reinforced by American art students who typically studied in Germany, Italy or France until the early 20th century. They emulated European styles of public art and by the mid-1800s, as a result of the Industrial Revolution and the burgeoning middle class, began to apply the techniques of monumental works to small-scale sculpture. John Quincy Adams Ward's The Indian Hunter, 1860, typifies the work of an American sculptor who was trained in Paris and returned to the United States to create small-scale bronze works for middle-class homes. Similarly, Daniel Chester French's Abraham Lincoln, a diminutive version of the monument at Nebraska's capitol, while executed five decades later, retains the traditional standards of veracity and authority found in 19th-century public sculpture.

By 1900, with modernism becoming a universal influence, sculpture was perceived as an art that could have intrinsic motivations, and need not always edify or commemorate. Though Americans such as Hoffman and Calder continued to study in Europe and especially in Paris, they combined traditional techniques with progressive styles, making dramatic advances by virtue of their proximity to the Impressionists, Fauvists, and Cubists. The Armory Show of 1913 in New York, which traveled to Chicago and Boston, included a wealth of American and European sculpture. This one exhibition helped to determine the independent course of American sculpture, providing sculptors with new references that would lead them to an indigenous imagery and a distinct version of modernism. Americans Man Ray, John Storrs and Alexander Archipenko set a new pace for sculptural innovations, bringing Dada, and abstraction into the forefront of the New York art world. Since the 1950s, Americans have made major contributions to international sculpture. Artists such as Donald Judd, Robert Rauschenberg and Mark di Suvero helped determine the course of 20th-century sculpture, making American artists the mentors for several generations of younger sculptors, like Joel Shapiro and Tony Berlant. Also included are folk art works. The 19th-century Horse by an unknown sculptor, and Two Bird Totem by Homer Green bracket more than a century of American works by untrained sculptors whose intuitive works are as compelling as those by their more sophisticated peers. Within the Hispanic-American folk tradition is George Lopez's Saint Raphael, a carved santos figure that indicates the breadth of influences found in the history of American sculpture.

Sheldon Statewide succeeds in large part due to the continuing support of the Nebraska Art Association, a non-profit organization dedicated to the advancement of the visual arts in Nebraska through educational and cultural enrichment opportunities. Of particular importance is the University of Nebraska-Lincoln's support of the Community Programs Coordinator position. Equally invaluable are the many local sponsors who support the exhibition in their respective communities. Their appreciation of both the immediate and long-range goals of Sheldon Statewide is especially meaningful. Their generosity has enabled tens of thousands of fellow citizens to encounter works of art of the highest quality.

Perhaps the most important component of this collaborative venture is the dauntless effort of the many volunteer docents at each venue. Their willingness to receive new and often complex information and disseminate it to the school children and adults of Nebraska is the vital link that binds together the Sheldon staff, the supporters, and viewers of each Sheldon Statewide exhibition.

Indian Hunter, critically acclaimed for its naturalism, brought fame to the artist when the work was exhibited in New York. Ward traveled to the Dakotas to observe Indian life before working on a full-scale Indian Hunter to be installed in Central Park in New York. The popular statuettes were produced in multiple edition. This version (without a bow in the hunter's hand) shows the young Indian restraining his snarling dog. One can easily imagine the presence of their prey. The truly American subject reflects the mid-19th-century concern for the imminent disappearance of the native people from their land, and the artist's responsibility to preserve information about their appearance and habits for future generations.

At a time when sculpture was often grandiose in theme and size, Bessie Potter Vonnoh's diminutive statuettes, often celebrating motherhood and childhood, portrayed a quick spontaneous impression. Eight years of the artist's childhood were spent as an invalid, perhaps as a result of hysterical trauma brought on by her father's death in an accident. As her health improved, she attended school and had her first experience with modeling, finding herself "enchanted" by the feel of clay. Vonnoh studied at The Art Institute of Chicago, and by age nineteen she was exhibiting and selling her work in Chicago shows. Minuet characterizes a young woman dressed in clothing typical of the late 19th-century, gracefully poised to begin the dance.

Homer Green, characterized as a "mountain man supreme," is now retired from a varied career as carpenter, farmer, blacksmith, dairyman, factory worker and utility lineman. To pass the time at his home near Brodyville, Tennessee, Green began carving small objects in cedar before deciding to create animal sculptures from logs, using a chain saw. Two Bird Totem is decorated with polka dots of color, a painting style admired by the artist's wife, but also reflecting what Green might see in the dappled shade of the sassafras tree. Can you identify the kinds of birds portrayed in this fanciful sculpture?

Malvina Hoffman
1887-1966
EGYPTIAN DANCER, NYOT A
1932, gilt-bronze
12 x 14 1/2 x 5 3/8 in.
UNL-Extended loan from anonymous donor
1990.L-20-90

This gilt-bronze model depicting an exotic dancer reflects Malvina Hoffman's greatest achievement. In 1930, she secured a commission for the creation of a sculptural Hall of Man at the Field Museum of Chicago. Completion of the one-hundred bronzes comprising the "Races of Man" led Hoffman to the remote corners of the globe in search of racial types. Early in her career, under Rodin's influence in Paris, the artist learned the importance of sculptural technique, knowledge of anatomy and foundry work. Of equal importance in Hoffman's work was a fascination with dance inspired by her friend, Russian prima ballerina Anna Pavlova.

Edward Kienholz

Like a drawing in space, the intersecting planes of this sculpture represent geometric abstraction and the influence of the new materials and processes of industrial technology. One of the first American artists to create abstract pieces, Ibram Lassaw was stimulated by Alexander Calder's kinetic art before deciding to turn his energies in the direction of open space densities and volume relationships. As he observed the work of Calder and other modernist artists, Lassaw's transition to an abstract style was swift and complete. Born in Alexandria, Egypt, Lassaw immigrated to this country when he was eight years old. His family settled in Brooklyn where he began to study art, learning traditional sculpting techniques.

David Hare
CATCH
1947, bronze
9 13/16 x 14 3/4 x 9 in.
UNL-Elizabeth B. Munson Acquisition Trust
1985.U-3781

David Hare's interest in chemistry and medicine nearly led him to become a doctor. Then a fascination with photography resulted in his photographing operations in hospitals for several years. Experimenting with an abstract new photographic technique, he came in contact with leading Surrealists, eventually exhibiting his photographs with the most prominent international artists identified with the movement. By 1944, he began to work with sculpture, a medium that allowed a greater range of creative expression and brought him almost instantaneous success. Catch, cast in bronze using the lost wax method, displays Hare's intention to avoid copying nature while keeping a strong connection with reality.

Reared in rural Washington state with the expectation of becoming a rancher, Edward Kienholz was a self-taught artist whose work evolved from abstract paintings to three-dimensional constructions utilizing found objects, sometimes expanded to a theatrical, walk-in scale. Kienholz had a passion for social commentary, often with a dark view of the human condition. Opti-Can Royale, produced with a set of six interchangeable photographs, is one of several editions of televisions fabricated by Kienholz as an ironic commentary on the potential of that medium to influence thought and mesmerize the viewer. Kienholz died in June of 1994.
George Lopez is one in a lineage of generations of northern New Mexican santeros, or saintmakers, who carved holy images (santos) from wood. Continuing the tradition of chip carving created by his father, Lopez developed his own style, achieving a sense of color in his figures with a combination of different woods rather than paint. He has gained a national reputation for his carvings, which are described as having a quiet dignity, seeming to "glow with an inner spirituality." In this sculpture, the fish shown in St. Raphael's hand are a reference to the Bible, in which Raphael instructed Tobias to heal his father's blindness with the ashes of burned fish.

Robert Rauschenberg was described as reacting against the "high seriousness and solemn introspection of Abstract Expressionism," and in the process he has raised some fundamental questions about art and its relationship to life. Constantly exploring the use of different techniques, Rauschenberg is an eclectic and prolific artist. R.F.D. exemplifies the artist's fascination with the thrown-away junk of an industrial society. He has recreated in clay a castoff corrugated packing box complete with printing, shipping labels and binding tapes to create a convincing illusion.

California artist and teacher Sam Richardson gained a national reputation with his finely-polished painted landscape sculptures made from a variety of plastic materials. Departing from his earliest work as a landscape painter, Richardson began to explore the new technology of plastics in the 1960s. In sculpting the landscape, traditionally regarded as a painting subject, the artist relies on the viewer's active imagination and individual interpretation. Lake in the Mountains is Frozen After the Snow seems to resemble a square plug taken from the earth - "a landscape hovering in space."

The critically acclaimed sculptures of Joel Shapiro appear abstract when viewed from some vantage points and figurative when viewed from others. Rectangular forms relate to the human body - "form becomes a metaphor for human experience." The artist says he works with wood because, "I can chop it up, build it, form it. If I need something...I can glue it up." Once the form is realized from wood blocks, without joints or modeling, Shapiro casts it in bronze. He prefers not to use titles for his work, believing that art is a purely visual experience. Untitled is intended to be placed on the floor, where it shares the same space with the viewer.

John Storrs' Figurative Abstraction seems to address the theme of love, conveying the unity of two figures. With a focus on the back of each figure, and no distinguishing facial features, the artist conveys a message through line and form. As a favored student of Rodin, Storrs developed his own eclectic style, exploring Cubism as well as the relationship between sculpture and architecture. Described as a true cosmopolitan, Storrs worked both in his native Chicago and Paris. He was detained in France during World War II, enduring bombings, poverty, and imprisonment by the Nazis.
