Most Popular Downloads for February 2008, UNL Digital Commons

This month's most popular article, "RODENTS AS A FOOD SOURCE," (from the Proceedings of the Fourteenth Vertebrate Pest Conference 1990) was referenced by food blogger Jesse Sharrad at <http://corduroyorange.com/?p=273> and experienced 50 to 100 hits daily for several weeks afterwards. Interesting article, but lately I've been eyeing the campus squirrels and thinking "Brunswick stew".

Other newcomers to the top of the list include Roscoe Pound's classic essay "Justice according to Law" (from The Mid-West Quarterly 1914), which has a link from the Wikipedia article on Pound.

Theodore Parker's "Strauss's Life of Jesus," an 1840 review from the Christian Examiner of David Strauss's Das Leben Jesu (1835) showed a strong surge of interest. I don't know if this represents a sudden revival of interest in Parker, or Strauss, or Jesus. Again, there's a Wikipedia link from the article on David Strauss.

Four newly added works from the Nebraska Studies in Language, Literature, and Criticism series (developed by Louise Pound and others from the teens to the forties) also appear very high up the list: Signs, Omens, and Portents in Nebraska Folklore; Nebraska Folk Cures; Nebraska Place-Names; and Proverbial Lore in Nebraska. All benefited from being listed by John Mark Ockerbloom on The Online Books Page — <http://onlinebooks.library.upenn.edu/>

Also making the list in their first month out of the gate were 3 works by the inimitable Paul Johnsgard: Cranes of the World; A Guide to the Tallgrass Prairies of Eastern Nebraska and Adjacent States; and A Guide to the Natural History of the Central Platte Valley of Nebraska. These are all complete books and were immediately listed by The Online Books Page (which is picked up as an RSS feed by an amazing number of blogs of all descriptions).

One very sad note is the presence on the list of an article co-authored by Kent Hendrickson, "Myers-Briggs Type Indicator Profile and the Organization," which was downloaded many times in the days following his tragic fatal accident on I-80 last month.

Of course, there were the perennial favorites: Tom Winter on Greek archery and Roman concrete, Hossein Nouredini on biodiesel conversion, David Hansen on childhood physical abuse, Richard Dienstbier on arousal, Andrew Smith's bibliography of scarab literature, and Sue Ann Gardner's bibliography of oil and gas development (narrowly edging out husband Scott Gardner's dictionary of invertebrate zoology).

Plus, as always, the open-access theses and dissertations made another strong showing: Brenden Rensink, Kurt Kinbacher, Dilia Hernández Delgado, Julio César Sánchez Rondón, and Marina Fabrikant all had their work downloaded more than 100 times during the month.

Where are all these downloads coming from?

According to a usage report showing referrals, 51,238 downloads (out of a total of 64,667) came via search engine referrals; of these Google was responsible for 45,093 (88%). By contrast, Yahoo brought 1,887, and AOL 512. One-third of the Google-originated downloads came from outside the United States.

What accounts for these (relatively) large download numbers?

1. An active effort to place links at appropriate sites to materials held in the repository — including Wikipedia, Online Books Page, and others. Of course, sometimes it happens that a blogger does this on their own (as in the “Rodents as a Food Source” article), but depositors should think of places where their materials might be offered to potential users. Linking is very easy, since each document has its own permanent URL (which can be copied right from the browser's address bar).

2. Perhaps more important, is that each article is posted with a Google-searched abstract. While some repositories lament their “roach-motel” inactivity, their works are offered with little more than title, author, and date showing, reducing the likelihood of search-engine hits and giving little evidence that this is material that would be of interest to the user. A good long abstract with many key words used will greatly improve an article's position in Google search results. Of course, if an article is downloaded a lot (and, yes, Google does keep count of click-throughs), then Google will index the whole text of the article, not just the author-title-abstract-and first 100K of text that it originally does.

3. Data is like matter in that it has gravitational attraction for other data. I mean that the more traffic coming through the Digital Commons site, the higher its contents rank on Google search results. Thus, there's a feedback loop here that amplifies the effect of being in a successful repository. As the repository's content grows, and as traffic through the UNL Digital Commons site has increased (and article downloads have been increasing about 7–8% per month, i.e., tripling every year!), the relative position in Google's search results has been climbing and the rate of downloading has accelerated.

So the February numbers look like this:

Total hits	97,411	(includes ProQuest's ETDs)
Total article hits*	86,796
Article downloads *	64,667	(* new high for this repository)
Downloads as % of hits	74.5%
Articles (1/31/08)	10,705
Added in February	781

Articles available (2/29/08)	11,486
Avg downloads/article (month)	5.63
Referrals for downloads
Internal	13,429
External searches	51,238
Google	45,093
USA	29,852
Internat'l	15,241
other (Yahoo, et al.)	6,145
