Abstract
The women’s movement is a new wave of feminism that fights for the abolishment of the harassment and hyper-sexualization of women. It’s important because in today’s society, women are constantly getting degraded compared to men. It’s time to end the prejudice and see everybody as equals. I found that it’s a growing problem but anybody can become aware and realize the issues that surround us.

Key points
- The first step is to get educated in order to understand the discrimination between the two genders.
- Women are fighting for basic rights in everyday life.
- The separation has reached girls as young as six years old.
- In order for men and women to truly be equal, we have to break the separation between the two. There are no longer limits to what men can do that women can’t.

Conclusions & Discussion
I do agree with the information that I found saying that women really can’t be considered to have obtained these equality rights until people stop demeaning them in everyday life. The push for equality is a battle that is faced by girls and women of all ages in everyday life. 1 in 3 women face sexual harassment.

In the future, I hope to research the progress that these movements have made.
