Ten Qualities of Self-Renewing Faculty

Frederick M. Hudson
Teaching instrument. Issues being explored include instrument reliability, amount and form of information reported to faculty, and usefulness for teaching improvement.

The committee is also assessing the use of teaching portfolios for improvement of instruction and evaluation. In conjunction with the Center for Faculty Development, the Committee sponsored a campus-wide seminar during the fall semester by Lawrence Aleamoni of the University of Arizona on building a teaching portfolio. In addition, the committee is working with the Center for Faculty Development to provide sample teaching portfolios for faculty in the College of Agriculture.

Recognition of quality teaching in the College of Agriculture is being considered beyond an annual award made to one individual. The committee is exploring options which consider an Honor Roll for Teachers, more faculty-based recognition of quality teaching, recognition for graduate and undergraduate teaching, and consideration of teaching innovation and improvement.

Although the renewed administrative commitment to the role of teaching at Louisiana State University has been announced, faculty at LSU will require administrative support to facilitate career-long development in instruction. Some of the mechanisms for faculty development in teaching which are being explored by the committee include release time for curriculum development, evaluation of the feasibility or usefulness of in-house teaching sabbaticals, and development of closer working linkages with the Center for Faculty Development through a mentoring program.

Activities by this College of Agriculture standing committee reflect recognition of the need for ongoing faculty input in order to achieve the quality teaching environment deserved and sought by students and faculty at Louisiana State University.

Ten Qualities of Self-Renewing Faculty

by Frederick M. Hudson

Today's university faculty conduct their lives in the many dimensions of chaos. Our lives are profoundly affected by global turbulence and change. Even though we believe we are evolving toward "a new world order," we live our lives in the rattling shadows of pervasive doubt, confusion, and fear. This is not a time for teachers to be withdrawn or frozen by a failure of nerve. What is called for is leadership that generates renewal and hope throughout the uneven days ahead. All true leaders journey on the river of change, forging new paths into an unknown future. Only the planetary scope of leadership has changed. There are at least ten basic qualities shared by self-renewing teachers who seek to be their best in all seasons of their lives.

1. They are value-driven.

   Self-renewing faculty are committed to values and purpose. They know what they prefer. Their primary anchors are within themselves. For them, renewal is not mere responsiveness to change; it is the repeated revival of the central concerns of their lives within the changing contexts in which they find themselves. Something is always at stake, something matters, and time gets organized around those critical priorities. They are determined to make a difference. They are mentors.

2. They are connected to the world around them.

   Self-renewing faculty stay connected to the world around them. They are not loners. They seek out friends who can and will talk about whatever needs to be talked about—the whole of life experience, up and down and all around. They listen and empathize with life everywhere. They care and communicate. They stay in contact with their children and/or parents, students and colleagues, and take initiative in sustaining relationships. They may not be joiners, but they feel that the world is there for them to enjoy, to grab on to, and to learn from. They

There are at least ten basic qualities shared by self-renewing teachers who seek to be their best in all seasons of their lives.
Ten Qualities of Self-Renewing Faculty

1. They are value-driven.
2. They are connected to the world around them.
3. They require solitude and quiet.
4. They pace themselves.
5. They have contact with nature.
6. They are creative and playful.
7. They are adaptive to change.
8. They learn from down-time.
9. They are always in training.
10. They are future-oriented.

They support causes and take stands.

Self-renewing faculty require times of solitude and quiet. They know how to refill their cups before they get emptied. They plan time for introspection as well as for interaction and decision making. They have private lives that they nurture and love. They have regularly scheduled times when they withdraw from routines to spend time alone. They retreat to some “secret garden” where renewal is predictable, simple, spontaneous, wonder-full. In solitude, they look, listen, meditate, and nurture themselves. They honor their inner life and outer boundaries.

Our current practice for renewal is to indulge in rigorous work schedules throughout each week, punctuated by “time-off” on weekends and vacations. In a chaotic world, occasional breaks are not enough to sustain the self-renewal process. They wash away quickly into our dominant routines. Renewal must be built into the ordinary, chaotic, ongoing rhythms of our life-styles and work-styles. Self-renewing faculty pace themselves. They schedule episodic breaks from their routine time, such as travel, holidays, vacations, retreats, seminars, theatre, sports activities, and sabbaticals. They are not trying to sustain optimal performance at everything they do; rather, they seek to be fully present and available for all the occasions of their life course. They are more interested in quality time than in busy schedules, more concerned with effective lives than with efficient actions, more committed to integrity and style than to short-term results and applause. They do not constantly give themselves away, nor do they aspire to roles that do not fit them.

Self-renewing faculty often find nature to be a dependable source of renewal. It may be hearing a wave hit the beach, seeing a leaf turning yellow in the fall, feeling a snowflake drift onto your cheek, or smelling a forest coming to life in the spring. Much of the teaching profession is spent away from natural forces—in buildings and settings that insulate us from powerful renewal readily available to us. Yet there are few among us who could not spend a half hour each day in some natural environment—to look and smell and listen.

Self-renewing faculty are usually creative and playful. They are active, not passive. Rather than sitting on the sidelines to watch the world go by, they pursue ways to express themselves. They like to exercise, explore, and experiment. They indulge in humor and are able to laugh at themselves. They become renewed when they read books, see art they like, hear their kind of music, or experience theatre.

Self-renewing faculty are adaptive to change, so they keep pursuing their best options. They look for habits to give up and better ones to begin. They pay attention to what they are doing, how they are feeling, and whether they should change. They are caringly evaluative about their lives. Part of them is always looking in on the other parts and caring for the whole. They make decisions with enthusiasm and congruence and can say no as clearly as yes.

Self-renewing faculty learn from their disappointments, necessary losses, and down times. Like the lives of most people, their lives are sometimes full of funk and disorientation. They do not live lives without stress, failures, mistakes, loss, and tragedy. Their lives are not sweet or perfect. They know that they have unresolved conflicts, limited perspectives, and impulses that sometimes overpower them. They do not deny the dilemmas of their lives. They accept the loose ends and unfinished business of their lives as part of their own future agenda.

Self-renewing faculty never stop learning. When the world presents a problem, they assume that they can master it through new training. Learning, which is their profession, is an attitude toward facing the unknown. Self-renewing faculty don’t feel locked into who they were so much as alive to the people they’re becoming. Learning helps them feel their pulse, measure their paths, and integrate their lives.
They are future-oriented.

Self-renewing faculty are future-oriented. They live conscious lives today, with intentionality for tomorrow. They formulate scenarios of the future and rehearse them until they are leading anticipatory lives, vitally connecting their current conditions to desired futures. They create the future in the very act of rehearsing it. They celebrate life—past, present, and future. They rejoice.

Frederick Hudson is President of The Hudson Institute of Santa Barbara, California and author of The Adult Years: Mastering the Art of Self-Renewal.

This article is reproduced with permission from Teaching Excellence, a publication of the Professional and Organizational Network in Higher Education.

ORED TO LAUNCH NEW INITIATIVE IN HUMANITIES AND SOCIAL SCIENCES

by James Midgley
Associate Vice-Chancellor
Office of Research

The Office of Research and Economic Development (ORED) is launching a new initiative to boost LSU’s performance in attracting funds for sponsored research in the humanities and social sciences. Announcing several steps to be taken by ORED to enhance sponsored research activities in these fields, Harvill Eaton, Vice-Chancellor for Research and Economic Development, pointed out that while the social sciences and humanities have an impressive record, more can be done to assist faculty secure funding for their research. Despite current budget difficulties, ORED will be working closely with the Center for Faculty Development to help faculty gain better knowledge about grant funding opportunities and to improve their abilities to write and secure grants in the future.

Eaton announced that Jim Midgley, Dean of the School of Social Work, joined his office as Associate Vice-Chancellor in January on a part-time basis to coordinate these activities. Midgley has been working informally with ORED since July, but with his appointment, it is expected that new opportunities for training, coordination, and information dissemination will be created. Midgley will continue to serve as Dean of the School of Social Work for the time being.

Several exciting orientations and workshops are being planned jointly with the Center for Faculty Development in the spring semester. A general “Road map” orientation session for faculty in all disciplines will be offered on February 2, and this will be followed later in the month by specialized workshops which will focus specifically on grant funding opportunities in the humanities, social sciences, education, and the human services. Later, “hands-on” grants writing workshops for these different fields will be held.

In addition to faculty development activities, ORED and the Center for Faculty Development will be working together to improve the dissemination of information about grant funding opportunities and to inform faculty about successful grant activities of other LSU faculty in the humanities and social sciences. Networking sessions at which faculty describe their activities are also being planned. ORED also hopes to improve the coordination of grant funding activities in the social sciences and humanities and to identify new opportunities for sponsored research in these fields.

"Despite current budget difficulties, ORED will be working closely with the Center for Faculty Development to help faculty gain better knowledge about grant funding opportunities and to improve their abilities to write and secure grants in the future."

James Midgley, Associate Vice-Chancellor
Office of Research