October 2001

Court Review: Volume 38, Issue 3 - Editor's Note

Follow this and additional works at: http://digitalcommons.unl.edu/ajacourtreview

Part of the Jurisprudence Commons

http://digitalcommons.unl.edu/ajacourtreview/181

This Article is brought to you for free and open access by the American Judges Association at DigitalCommons@University of Nebraska - Lincoln. It has been accepted for inclusion in Court Review: The Journal of the American Judges Association by an authorized administrator of DigitalCommons@University of Nebraska - Lincoln.
EDITOR’S NOTE

Our issue begins with Judge Procter Hug, Jr.’s thoughts on judicial independence under pressure. We reprint the remarks he gave as the featured speaker at the American Judges Association’s annual educational conference in October 2001. Judge Hug’s comments, as well as those of AJA president Bonnie Sudderth in her president’s column, deal with issues faced by judges in times of crisis, including in the aftermath of the September 11, 2001 terrorist attacks in the United States.

Our articles begin with an exchange regarding the suggestibility of children as a factor in assessing their credibility as witnesses. A bit of background will place these articles in context.

In our Summer 2000 issue, we featured an essay by Stephen J. Ceci and Maggie Bruck titled, “Why Judges Must Insist on Electronically Preserved Recordings of Child Interviews.” In it, Ceci and Bruck presented their suggestion that child-witness interviews generally should be electronically recorded so that the extent to which poor interviewing techniques led the children to adopt suggested responses could be assessed. That essay was both an introduction to and an outgrowth of Ceci and Bruck’s larger research, which is explained in detail in their book, Jeopardy in the Courtroom: A Scientific Analysis of Children’s Testimony, which won the 1999 William James Award of the American Psychological Association for best book.

Recently, the work of Ceci and Bruck has been criticized by USC law professor Tom Lyon. For the benefit of judges, we present an overview of this debate in a pair of articles. Forensic psychologist David Martindale, who frequently testifies in court as an expert witness, defends the Ceci-Bruck research and position. Martindale suggests that improperly suggestive interviewing techniques are sufficiently widespread to be of serious concern and that expert testimony can appropriately educate judges and jurors. Lyon, who is both a law professor and a psychologist, replies to Martindale, contending that current research does not show that improperly suggestive interviewing techniques are widespread and that expert testimony on that subject is not always appropriate. We think you’ll find their exchange a helpful introduction to this subject. For those interested in greater depth, all of the leading articles are cited in the footnotes of the two pieces.

We also present Professor Whitebread’s annual review of the civil decisions of the United States Supreme Court for the past term. As you will see, Bush v. Gore was far from the only significant case decided.

Last, we present the winning essay from the American Judges Association’s law school essay contest for 2000. Roxana Cardenas, who went to law school while already employed as a court interpreter in Los Angeles, has both interesting experiences and suggestions, which she shares in this article. —SL.