Moving Upstream: Voices of Asian Americans in Higher Education

Abstract

Asian Americans and Pacific Islanders have traveled the professional waterways of higher education on different streams. For some, those streams have been very tranquil, yet for many the waters have been rather choppy. These experiences have been no different from other people of color who serve at predominantly white institutions.

Asian Americans and Pacific Islanders have traveled the professional waterways of higher education on different streams. For some, those streams have been very tranquil, yet for many the waters have been rather choppy. These experiences have been no different from other people of color who serve at predominantly white institutions. Asian Americans and Pacific Islanders have only recently begun to become a "voice" on college campuses. Panelists will present and discuss how the perceptions of Asian Americans as "model Minorities" have affected relationships on college campuses and how they have navigated their careers.
