Abstract

Society sees the homeless as the unworthy and less fortunate population of the world. Society looks down on the homeless and pity's them. They throw spare change in their hands and then go on with their lives not giving them another thought. But what society doesn't realize is that homeless people spend days on on without getting their basic needs met. They lack money, food, water, shelter, and medical assistance. Which leads them to think outside og the box in order to survive.

Conclusion & Discussion

Homelessness is a world-wide dilemma that needs to be paid more attention to. Homeless people are not unworthy. They deserve the same respect and basic dignity that anyone else receives. Society needs to give the homeless a second chance at being a regular human of society regardless of how they became homeless. We as a whole should be lifting gthem up instead of tearing them down. If we do not focus more on the homeless population it will continue to grow and the situation will be even harder to control. No human being should be treated less than just because they're homeless.

Key Points/ Facts

- Some homeless people live on the streets; some under bridges; some sleep in doorways, and some stay in abandoned apartments
- 70% of the homeless population consists of individual while the other 30% consists of families with children
- Shelters are more focused on allowing families rather than individual people
- Many homeless people rely on government assistance
