The Solution of the Attrition Problem and a Crediting Mechanism for Service-Learning Experiences

At the University of Minnesota, Duluth, students have been involved in solving such major campus problems as the retention of predicted low achievers from ten percent to over 40 percent. In the year ahead as campuses are faced with reduced enrollment, retrenchment, and the impact of inflation, students will be able to fulfill a number of the functions now carried out by faculty and staff. Robert Falk will provide a paper outlining two programs which have been used there: one for the solution of the attrition problem and the other which is a crediting mechanism for service-learning experiences.

the PEPA Questionnaire

Robert M. Diamond and Edward F. Kelly have information on the Planning for the Evaluation of Programs and Agencies (PEPA) Questionnaire which was designed as part of a systematic process to assist those involved with the administration of academic agencies or departments in selecting the criteria by which the success of that unit will be judged. The recommended procedure for use of PEPA requires that all major groups and individual decision makers who have responsibilities within or for a specific agency or unit actually participate in the evaluation process. The criteria that are established ideally should be agreed to and understood by all. Diamond and Kelly will provide you a copy of the guidelines for the administration, analysis, and interpretation of the PEPA Questionnaire and will grant permission for the duplication and use of the questionnaire so long as proper credit is given to the authors. Their procedure was developed through extensive input from POD Members.
