7-24-2016

Nebraska's Wedding Crasher

Jennine Capó Crucet

University of Nebraska-Lincoln, jcrucet@unl.edu

Follow this and additional works at: http://digitalcommons.unl.edu/englishfacpubs

Part of the Comparative Literature Commons, English Language and Literature Commons, Family, Life Course, and Society Commons, Modern Literature Commons, Place and Environment Commons, and the Regional Sociology Commons

http://digitalcommons.unl.edu/englishfacpubs/168

This Article is brought to you for free and open access by the English, Department of at DigitalCommons@University of Nebraska - Lincoln. It has been accepted for inclusion in Faculty Publications -- Department of English by an authorized administrator of DigitalCommons@University of Nebraska - Lincoln.
Opinion by Jennine Capo Crucet
The author of the novel "Make Your Home Among Strangers" and an assistant professor of English and ethnic studies at the University of Nebraska in Lincoln.

Lincoln, Neb. Last summer I attended more than a dozen wedding receptions they were held in the same building. This was not by choice. In the aftermath of my divorce, I moved to Lincoln, Neb., because I had the idea of "starting over" in my head. Of course this required renting a fantastic apartment that had nothing in common with the suburban house my ex-husband and I had just put on the market. The one I found was gorgeous (20-foot ceilings!) and quirky (it used to be the federal building — I'm living in what used to be the city's mailroom!) and seemingly perfect for the young, hip, professional single person I was turning into. And it was perfect, until the first weekend I was there. That's when the weddings started.

My building thinks of itself as Lincoln's premier wedding venue. I was not told this when I signed the lease. A glitch of duct work sends the sounds of every single party straight through the exhaust fan of my apartment's bathroom, so loud and clear that I can hear the names of everyone in the wedding party as they are announced — not just in the bathroom, but from the living room. I can hear when people are clapping, can hear the claps as individual sonic events: I can almost always make out the crisp echo of the last person clapping.

About a third of the time with these weddings, there is a moment deep into the reception when the D.J. stops the party to say that the groom would like to dedicate a special song to his bride, and that song is almost always Sir-Mix-A-Lot's "Baby Got Back." This, too, has happened several times: A bridesmaid and her boyfriend or a groomsman and his girlfriend stumble down my hallway, thinking my or a groomsman and his girlfriend gasp overlapping cut. to the event. In grabbing a slice of cake place this short, dark-haired, defi­ pensation for hearing "Baby Got Back" twice a weekend and having to ask Tay­lor/Tyler to talk somewhere else. From my place, I could make out when it was cake time, and after hearing everyone either laugh (because the bride and groom had shoved cake in each other's faces) or saying "Awww" (because they'd chosen not to), I would throw on a black dress and head down the hall. I decided I was subtext contributing to the event. In grabbing a slice of cake and eating it calmly while standing near some great-aunt as she tried to place this short, dark-haired, defi­nately-too-brown-to-be-a-relative guest standing before her, I was part of the Unique Package, "unique" being the quality every couple aims for because on what they're told is the most special day of their life, no one wants to believe they're a type.

This March, the reception space in every country changes. how different your life is from what you thought it would be. Behind me, a runway show was starting to the tune of Pitbull's "Fireball." I turned around, and whether I liked it or not, they shimmered: a gaggle of young Nebraska women turned into princesses, each floating by me to­ ward some interchangeable prince.

LINCOLN, NEB. A big sister's/brother's wedding recep­tion, waving to guests as they tried to vote my place, I could make out when it was cake time, and after hearing everyone either laugh (because the bride and groom had shoved cake in each other's faces) or saying "Awww" (because they'd chosen not to), I would throw on a black dress and head down the hall. I decided I was subtext contributing to the event. In grabbing a slice of cake and eating it calmly while standing near some great-aunt as she tried to place this short, dark-haired, defi­nately-too-brown-to-be-a-relative guest standing before her, I was part of the Unique Package, "unique" being the quality every couple aims for because on what they're told is the most special day of their life, no one wants to believe they're a type.

This, too, has happened several times: A bridesmaid and her boyfriend or a groomsman and his girlfriend stumble down my hallway, thinking my or a groomsman and his girlfriend gasp overlapping cut. to the event. In grabbing a slice of cake place this short, dark-haired, defi­nately-too-brown-to-be-a-relative guest standing before her, I was part of the Unique Package, "unique" being the quality every couple aims for because on what they're told is the most special day of their life, no one wants to believe they're a type.

When asked, I told most of these well-meaning vendors I was a bride-to-be or the sister of a bride-to-be. What I learned quickly not to say was that I was divorced, as this got me politely shunned from whatever free sample they were offering. "You only get mar­ried once!" they reassured me. Divorce threatened the very angle that has made weddingplanning a $60-billion-a-year in­dustry.

"The Mason jar thing is so over," another vendor told me. My mouth full of bacon-wrapped dates, I asked what, then, is the new thing. "Industrial Modern or Bohemian Classic," she added. "We're seeing a lot of unique things come out of those themes."

I overheard vendors asking brides the same questions and feigning the same excitement when the women said that whatever they did, they wanted it to be unique. Yet all the receptions I've witnessed in this building so far — de­spite every bride's best efforts — looked pretty much exactly the same. At the wedding fair, I confronted one of the D.J.s — the cheesiest looking one, who'd set up all his lights and was using a microphone even though it wasn't turn on. He was why I was really there. He was the one filling my bath­room with a cacophony of reminders that lots of people were in love and happy, reminding me that I, too, was a type, a sad little rat scurrying around the fringes of a wedding recep­tion, picking at leftover cake in an effort to throw myself against the glass-jar­wall of my new life. The life of a di­vorced woman who suddenly found the institution of marriage troubling but who didn't want to be that type and so started doing this unique version of crashing weddings that was actually not unique at all.

"Do you do a lot of weddings in this building?" I asked.

"Oh, yeah, yeah, I do most of them, actually. I'm in high demand."

"That's great," I said. "Do you realize that everyone on the west side of this building can hear every word you say inside their apartments?"

At this point "Crocodile Rock" came over on his speakers. "Whoa, that's weird," he said to me.

"You say the same thing at every wedding," I said. "Sometimes you even play the same songs in the same order."

He said, "Yeah, well . . . " and then dropped his eyes to his laptop, as if there had suddenly been some iTunes emergency.

There is nothing like having a wed­ding D.J. ignore you to the tune of "Crocodile Rock" to make you realize how different your life is from what you thought it would be.

This, too, has happened several times: A bridesmaid and her boyfriend or a groomsman and his girlfriend stumble down my hallway, thinking my or a groomsman and his girlfriend gasp overlapping cut. to the event. In grabbing a slice of cake place this short, dark-haired, defi­nately-too-brown-to-be-a-relative guest standing before her, I was part of the Unique Package, "unique" being the quality every couple aims for because on what they're told is the most special day of their life, no one wants to believe they're a type.

This, too, has happened several times: A bridesmaid and her boyfriend or a groomsman and his girlfriend stumble down my hallway, thinking my or a groomsman and his girlfriend gasp overlapping cut. to the event. In grabbing a slice of cake place this short, dark-haired, defi­nately-too-brown-to-be-a-relative guest standing before her, I was part of the Unique Package, "unique" being the quality every couple aims for because on what they're told is the most special day of their life, no one wants to believe they're a type.