1999

A Tchaikovsky/George Eliot Opera That Never Happened

Follow this and additional works at: http://digitalcommons.unl.edu/ger
Part of the Comparative Literature Commons, Literature in English, British Isles Commons, and the Women's Studies Commons

http://digitalcommons.unl.edu/ger/337

This Article is brought to you for free and open access by the English, Department of at DigitalCommons@University of Nebraska - Lincoln. It has been accepted for inclusion in The George Eliot Review by an authorized administrator of DigitalCommons@University of Nebraska - Lincoln.
A TCHAIKOVSKY/GEORGE ELIOT OPERA THAT NEVER HAPPENED

The Tchaikovsky Museum at Klin in Moscow in Russia had, amongst the composer’s papers, a manuscript of fragments of a scenario for an opera on the theme of ‘Mr Gilfil’s Love-Story’, the second story in Scenes of Clerical Life.

Tchaikovsky modestly mentions this in his biography, stating that at first he proposed an opera based on ‘The Sad Fortunes of the Reverend Amos Barton’, the first story in Scenes but was drawn instead to another of the stories, ‘Mr Gilfil’s Love-Story’. The composer’s friend, the music critic G. A. Larosh, mentions in his memoirs that for some weeks before his death Tchaikovsky talked about the theme of a new opera. The previous summer Tchaikovsky had read, in a French translation, Scenes of Clerical Life. He loved George Eliot's novels, starting with The Mill on the Floss in the last years of his life. He particularly appreciated the pathos of ‘Mr Gilfil’s Love-Story’, which is set in the eighteenth century, and thought the subject was splendidly suitable for adaptation as an opera.

Sadly, nothing came of what might have been something very special.